Daniel, Book of.

The Book.—It narrates the story of Daniel, who (1: 1-6) was carried away captive by King Nebuchadnezzar in the third year of Jehoiakim, B.C. 605. The book is written partly in Hebrew and partly (from 2: 4b to ch. 7) in Aramaic.

Author.—According to the orthodox interpreters the book was written by Daniel, who lived during the whole of the Babylonian exile, down to the third year of Cyrus (10: 1). Daniel is mentioned outside this book in Ezek. 14: 14, 20, together with Noah and Job, and in Ezek. 28: 3; in the former passage his righteousness is spoken of, and in the latter his wisdom. Josephus adds some details not found in the Bible (Antiq., x., 11, 6), which tend to prove that Daniel was a well-known historical character prior to the Grecian period. The knowledge of Babylonian life in the first part (chs. 1-6) (which is largely confirmed by modern discoveries) indicates that the book was composed in Babylonia, and not in Palestine.

Contents.—The first part of the book, which is mainly historical, consists of chs. 1-6. Ch. 1 records the captivity of Daniel and his companions in the third year of Jehoiakim, and their subsequent training for civil service at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Ch. 2 contains the account of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the great image, interpreted by Daniel, and the promotion of Daniel and his three companions in the province of Babylon. The vision of Nebuchadnezzar depicted the four great world-empires which were to come in contact with the people of Israel before the setting up of the Messianic kingdom and up to the time of its final victory. Ch. 3 gives the account of Nebuchadnezzar's golden image in the plain of Dura, and the deliverance of Daniel's three companions from the fiery furnace. Ch. 4 records Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the great tree, and the fulfilment of that vision by his being afflicted with a seven years' madness because of pride. Ch. 5 records one of the grandest episodes in Israel's captivity—Belshazzar's feast and its tragic close. Ch. 6 records Daniel's deliverance from the den of lions.

The second portion of the book consists of Daniel's own visions, contained in the last six chapters (chs. 7-12). The first vision (ch. 7) is that of the four great wild beasts, which represent, though under somewhat different aspects, the four kingdoms portrayed in Nebuchadnezzar's dream. Ch. 8 contains the vision of "the ram and the he-goat," which describes the contest between the Persian and the Grecian empires, the overthrow of the latter by Alexander the Great, and the oppression of the children of Israel by Antiochus Epiphanes. Ch. 9 describes Daniel's prayer and confession of sin at the end of the seventy years' captivity predicted by Jeremiah, and the answer to that prayer by the promise of Messiah's atoning work at the close of "the seventy weeks." Ch. 10 describes the vision of the mighty angel to Daniel, introductory to the description of the prophecy "noted in the scripture of truth" (ch. 10: 21). This is given in chs. 11 and 12, in which chapters the wars between Syria (the kingdom of the north) and Egypt (the kingdom of the south) are depicted.

Dedication, Feast of the. The festival instituted to commemorate the purging of the temple and the rebuilding of the altar after Judas Maccabæus had driven out the Syrians, B.C. 164. (I. Mac. 4: 52-59.) It is named only once in the canonical Scriptures. (John 10: 22.) It commenced on the 25th of Chisleu (early in December), the anniversary of the pollution of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 167. Like the great Mosaic feasts, it lasted eight days, but it did not require attendance at Jerusalem. It was an occasion of much festivity, and was celebrated in nearly the same manner as the feast of tabernacles, with the carrying of branches of trees and with much singing. In the temple at Jerusalem the "Hallel" (Ps. 113 to 118) was sung every day of the feast.

Deuteronomy, Book of.
Name.—The name 'Deuteronomy' is derived from the incorrect rendering of the LXX. translation of the expression in ch. 17: 18, which is correctly rendered in the A.V. 'a copy of the law.' This phrase was erroneously supposed to refer to the whole book.
Contents.—The book is almost entirely made up of addresses delivered by Moses to the people. It may be divided into five parts: (1) Chs. 1-4: 43, a 'resume' of the history of Israel during the journey through the wilderness, to which is attached an impressive admonition to obey the law, and an account of the appointment of cities of refuge on the eastern side of Jordan. (2) Chs. 4: 44-26, the second address, partly delivered by Moses, i. e., chs. 5-11, and partly added to in writing, i. e., chs. 12-26: 15. This speech commences with a recitation of the decalogue, with various warnings and exhortations based on this, and concludes with several special directions. (3) Chs. 27 and 28, the concluding speech, containing directions as to the writing down of the law after the crossing of the Jordan, and the delivery of blessings and cursings from Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal respectively. (4) Chs. 29-31, Moses' farewell speech and warning to the people, and his charge to Joshua. (5) Chs. 32-34, the song of Moses and the announcement of his death; the blessing of Moses and his death and burial.

Ecclesiastes, Book of.

The Title.—The book of Ecclesiastes, like Proverbs, is one of the class of "Wisdom literature." It forms a continuous soliloquy on the vanity of human wishes, put by the author into the mouth of Solomon, the wise king of Israel. The title assigned to the king in the book is 'Koheleth.' In the LXX. it is Ecclesiastes, in the English A.V. it is The Preacher, while the R.V. (margin) gives it The Great Orator.

Author.—The common opinion in ancient times was that the author of the book was King Solomon. That opinion was not entirely accepted by Jewish scholars. The language of Ecclesiastes is unique. In many of its features it bears a strong resemblance to the later books of the Old Testament; in others it approximates to the language of post-biblical literature.

Contents.—The book is a discussion of the problem, Can the world without God meet man's need? Can man truly live without God? The conclusion is, "All is vanity," unless man "fears God and keeps his commandments." The drift of the book is, briefly, that life is full of disappointment and dissatisfaction; man should seek to enjoy in moderation the blessings God has granted unto him, making the approval of God his great object, knowing that after death there is a judgment.

Israel" (Ex. 3:16) were a senate of the people in Moses' time, and continued to be so through all the vicissitudes of the Hebrew history (Ezra 5:5; Jer. 29:1). "The elders," as a distinct body, are often mentioned in the N.T. They act co-ordinately with (1) the chief priests (Mat. 21:23), (2) the chief priests and scribes (Mat. 16:21), (3) all the council (Mat. 26:59). In the N.T. church "the elders" are the presbyters or ministers (Ac. 20:17).

Ephesians, Epistle to the.
Date.—This epistle belongs to the group which is called "the epistles of the imprisonment" or "of the captivity," i. e., the first Roman imprisonment, during which St. Paul wrote Philippians, Philemon, Colossians, and Ephesians. The letter was probably written and sent near to the close of the first Roman imprisonment, about the year A.D. 63.
Characteristics.—In all these letters he describes himself as a prisoner (Phil. 1:13, 17; Phile. 1, 23; Col. 4:10, 18; Eph. 3:1; 4:1). As we might expect from the fact of their being written almost at the same time, there is great resemblance between the letters to the Colossians and to the Ephesians. Out of the hundred and fifty-five verses in Ephesians, seventy-eight contain expressions identical with those in Colossians. But the two epistles, although similar, are not the same. In Colossians the glory of Christ as head of the universe and of the church is magnified. In Ephesians it is the catholicity of the church itself that is set forth as the outcome of the doctrine of adoption in Christ. In Colossians it is the glory of Christ that is emphasized; in Ephesians the work of the Spirit, for it is through the Spirit that the presence and energy of Christ is continued in the church (1:13; 2:22; 4:3, 30; 5:18; 6:17, 18).
Occasion.—The fact that Tychicus was going from Rome to Colossæ (Col. 4:7) was an opportunity of sending a letter not only to that city, but to other Christians in Asia (Eph. 6:21). There is little doubt that this magnificent epistle was originally a circular one, and that Ephesus was only one of the cities in the Roman province of Asia to which it was addressed.
Style.—The language of the epistle is marked by an overflowing copiousness of expression, sometimes resulting in involved and prolonged constructions (1:3-14). The writer finds even the grand resources of the Greek language unequal to the task of conveying to others the flood of heavenly thoughts which spring up within him as his mind soars from his prison in Rome to the throne of God; this is specially the case in the first chapter.

Contents.—The epistle expounds the conception of the ideal church and draws practical conclusions from it. The church is the body of Christ, and the fulness of Him that filleth all in all (1: 23; 4: 12-16); the holy temple of God (2: 20-22); and the spotless spouse of Christ (5: 25-28). As the fulness of the Godhead resides in Christ, so the fulness of Christ resides in his church. This ideal church is in process of being realized. The actual church has many defects and blemishes. But "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" will be reached at last (4: 13); and it is the duty of each individual member to work towards this end, especially through the Christian family, which is a symbol and likeness of the church. The usual salutation (1: 1, 2) and thanksgiving (1: 3-14) are followed by a corresponding intercession (1: 15-2: 10) and a contrast between unconverted and converted Gentiles (2: 11-22). The apostle's special interest in the conversion of the Gentiles (3: 1-21) leads up to exhortations respecting the unity of the catholic church and the duties of its members (4: 1-6: 20); after which comes a personal explanation, and the concluding benediction (6: 21-24).

Esther, Book of.

Name and Author.—The book of Esther is so called from the principal character in the narrative. The date of its composition is uncertain. The writer's knowledge of the character of Xerxes (which is historically accurate) and his familiarity with Persian manners and customs (1: 3; 4: 11; 8: 8) show that the work has an historical basis.

Object.—The object of the book is manifestly to explain, from history, the origin and motive of the feast of Purim, or "lots." The historical character of the narrative has been questioned, but there must have been some adequate cause, similar to that described in the book, to account for the Purim feast.

Contents.—The book relates how Esther, a Jewish maiden, dwelling in Susa, the Persian capital, became queen of Ahasuerus, or Xerxes (485-465 B.C.), and was instrumental in rescuing her compatriots from the destruction prepared for them by Haman, the king's favorite. The name of God occurs nowhere in the book. The omission is perhaps intentional, in order to avoid irreverence, for the book was designed to be read in the Jewish houses during the festive banquets customary at the celebration of Purim (9: 27). In later times the book attained a great popularity among the Jews, who considered it superior to the writings of the prophets and the other parts of the Hagiographa.

Exile, Period of. The time spent by the Jews in captivity in Babylonia. See Chronology, Old Testament.

exilian, pertaining to the period of captivity in Babylon.

Exodus, Book of.

Name and Character.—The name 'departure,' in reference to the great event in the book; (cf. Heb. 11: 22) is derived from the Greek title in the LXX. through the Latin version. The book is full of suggestions of haste, of sojourning, of camp and camp life, and of the wilderness, while the minute details of the deliverance from Egypt and the sojourn about Sinai indicate that the author was familiar with all the life which he describes.

Contents.—The book continues the history of Israel, from the death of Joseph down to the giving of the law at Sinai, and the erection of the tabernacle. It may be divided into two parts: (1) Chs. 1-18 describe the oppression of the Israelites in Egypt, the history of Moses and his dealings with Pharaoh, the plagues, the exodus, the overthrow of the Egyptians, and the arrival at Sinai. (2) Chs. 19-40 contain an account of the sojourn at Sinai, the giving of the law, the directions respecting the tabernacle and its services, the story of the sin of the golden calf and the subsequent punishment, the giving of the new tables, and the erection and dedication of the tabernacle.

Ezekiel, Book of.

Author.—Ezekiel was one of those who were carried captive to Babylonia with King Jehoiachin, B.C. 597, and lived there at Tel-abib, on the banks of the canal or river of Chebar. He was a priest, the son of Buzi (1:3), and as such belonged to the aristocracy of Jerusalem. He received the prophetic call in the fifth year of the captivity (1:2), and prophesied for at least twenty-two years among his fellow exiles (cf. 29:17; his last dated prophecy was in the twenty-seventh year of the captivity). As to his subsequent fate nothing is known.

An uncertain tradition states that he died a martyr's death at the hands of his fellow exiles, who resented the tone of his prophecies. He was a younger contemporary of Jeremiah, and, like him, prophesied both before and after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. His prophecies, however, were all composed in Babylonia.
Analysis.—The book may be divided into three parts, each dealing with a different subject: (1) Chs. 1-24, the impending downfall of Jerusalem. Its ground is the nation's sinfulness. The song in ch. 21, the allegory in ch. 23, and the parable in ch. 24: 1-14, are all characteristic of the prophet. (2) Chs. 25-32, the prophecies against the foreign nations who rejoice at the fall of Jerusalem and regard it as a sign that Jehovah cannot defend his city. Jehovah will bring a similar misfortune upon them. (3) Chs. 33-47, Israel's restoration. The chapters (40-48), are not intended to be interpreted literally, but are an allegorical description of the new theocracy and the new temple, which will be built, not in the old Jerusalem, but in an ideal city, whose name is Jehovah-shammah (Jehovah is there).

Ezra and Nehemiah, Books of.
Position.—These books were regarded in ancient times as one. In the LXX. (second Ezra and Nehemiah) and Vulgate (first and second Ezra) and in later editions of the Hebrew Bible they are divided into two books.
Authorship.—Both books undoubtedly contain large portions of the original works of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 7: 27-9: 15; Neh. 1: 1-7: 5; Neh. 12: 31-42; Neh. 13: 4-31). In their present form the books were probably edited and revised by a later hand (Neh. 12: 10, 11, 22).
Contents.—They may be divided into four parts: (1) Ezra 1-6 describes the first return of the Jews under Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel and Joshua, the high priest, in the first year of Cyrus (536 B.C.), and the rebuilding of the temple, completed in the sixth year of Darius (516 B.C.). (2) Ezra 7-10 narrates the second migration from Babylon under Ezra, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (458-457 B.C.), and includes Ezra's prayer and confession festivals, Hebrew. There were three great feasts or festivals in the Jewish year: Passover in the spring, Pentecost fifty days later, and Tabernacles in the fall. Besides these was one fast day, the day of Atonement, held a week before the feast of Tabernacles. There were also three lesser feasts: Trumpets, or the opening of the civil year, in the fall; Dedication, in the early winter, and Purim, also in the winter. See articles under each of these titles.

(ch. 9) and the expulsion of foreign wives. (3) Nehemiah 1-7 relates how Nehemiah came to Jerusalem in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (445-444 B.C.), and rebuilt the walls of the city in spite of the hostility of Sanballat, the Horonite, and Tobiah, the Ammonite. (4) Neh. 8-13 describes the combined efforts of Ezra and Nehemiah to effect the restoration of religion, including the solemn reading of the Law, the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, the confession of the Levites, the sealing of the covenant by the people, a list of the inhabitants of Jerusalem and of other cities, the dedication of the walls, and the removal of certain abuses.

fig tree. This useful tree abounds in Palestine. It is the first tree mentioned in the Bible (Gen. 3: 7). From a remote antiquity it has been cultivated for its fruit, which in most warm countries forms an essential portion of the food of the inhabitants, either in a fresh or dried state. It lives to a great age, and reaches a very considerable size. Its thick, rigid leaves form a dense shade, and bear great heat without flagging. It puts forth its fruiting stems before its leaf buds expand, and these green figs remain through the winter, the first small ripe figs sometimes appearing in the early summer (S. of S. 2: 13). Joel refers to the destruction of the fig trees by barking the stems (Joel 1: 7). Fig trees were then, as now, planted in the corners of the vineyards (Lu. 13: 6). Cakes of dried and pressed figs were, and are still, used as an article of food. Its power of retaining flax, the oldest known textile fibre. It was woven into garments by the ancient Egyptians, and was swathed around their bodies after they were embalmed. It was an important crop in Egypt (Ex. 9: 31), and was known and used in Canaan before the entrance of the Israelites. The custom of blanching the flax fibre by exposure to the sun and air, practised to this day in many parts of Europe, is referred to in Josh. 2: 6. A mingled stuff, wool and flax together, was strictly prohibited (Lev. 19: 19; Deu. 22: 11).

flay, Lev. 1: 6; Mic. 3: 3.
flea, is twice referred to by David in addressing Saul, evidently as something of extreme insignificance (I. Sa. 24: 14; 26: 20). The flea is a common insect in the East, making up for its want of size by its energy and vast numbers.

frankincense, a vegetable resin, brittle, glittering, and of a bitter taste, used for the purpose of sacrificial fumigation. Ex. 30: 34-36. It was called 'frank' because of the freeness with which, when burned, it gives forth its odor. It burns for a long time, with a steady flame. It is obtained by successive incisions in the bark of a tree called 'Arbor thuris.' The tree which produces the Indian frankincense bears some resemblance when young to the mountain ash. It grows to be forty feet high. Frankincense was brought by Arabian merchants, Isa. 60: 6, and was among the gifts presented by the wise men to the infant Saviour, Mat. 2: 11.

frontlets, or phylacteries, Ex. 13: 16; Deu. 6: 8; 11: 18; Mat. 23: 5. These were strips of parchment, on which were written four passages of Scripture, Ex. 13: 2-10, 11-17; Deu. 6: 4-9, 13-23, in an ink prepared for the purpose. They were then rolled up in a case of black calfskin, which was attached to a stiffer piece of leather, having a thong one finger broad and one and a half cubits long. They were placed at the bend of the left arm. Those worn on the forehead were written on four strips of parchment and put into four little cells within a square case. The expression "they make broad their phylacteries."

frontlets—Continued
Mat. 23: 5, refers not so much to the phylactery itself, which seems to have been of a prescribed breadth, as to the case in which the parchment was kept, which the Pharisees, among their other pretentious customs, Mar. 7: 3, 4; Lu. 5: 33, etc., made as conspicuous as they could. It is said that the Pharisees wore them always, whereas the common people only used them at prayers.

Galatians, Epistle to.
Date.—The Epistle to the Galatians was written before that to the Romans, but probably after those to the Corinthians, while St. Paul was journeying through Macedonia to Greece late in A.D. 57.
The Galatian Churches.—We are uncertain whether it is the churches in the Roman province of Galatia, which included part of Phrygia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia, or only those in Galatia proper, which are addressed by the apostle. Its inhabitants were a mixed people, with a strong Celtic element from its Gallic conquerors; and in the want of stability, for which St. Paul rebukes them, some have seen an example of Celtic fickleness.
Occasion.—They received his preaching with enthusiasm, and became personally devoted to him. But after he left them some Judaizing teachers arrived, who affirmed that in order to be loyal Christians the Galatians must become loyal Jews and keep the Mosaic law; and to this persistent dogmatism the Galatians succumbed. This burning appeal is the result.
Characteristics.—The epistle is written rapidly, under the influence of strong emotion, and sweeps all before it in its fervid proclamation of the freedom of the gospel as opposed to the bondage of the law. As in II. Corinthians, Paul has to vindicate his claim to be an apostle. He has also to make clear that the Mosaic law, although divine in origin, is not binding upon Christians, because legal ordinances have been superseded by faith in Jesus Christ. Material which is roughly thrown together in this letter is worked up, together with a great deal of additional matter, into an elaborate structure in the Epistle to the Romans.
Summary.—We can trace three main divisions—personal, doctrinal, and hortatory. After the introduction (1:1-10), we have a vindication of his apostolic authority (1:11-2:21), and of the gospel as superseding the law (3:1-4:31); thence we pass to a practical application of this doctrine (5:1-6:10). The conclusion he writes with his own hand (6:11-18).

Galileans. In the province of Galilee, a large proportion of the population consisted of heathen elements, which gave it the name of "Galilee of the Gentiles," among them being Phœnicians, Arabians, Syrians, and Greeks. These people were not lacking in courage, but were given to change, sedition, and tumult. They were loyal to the temple and its services, but would be regarded religiously as more liberal than the inhabitants of Judea. The provincial dialect was corrupt, as compared with that gall. The Hebrew word 'rosh', thus translated, is in Hos. 10:4 translated "hemlock"; in other passages it is variously rendered. It was evidently some bitter vegetable extract from a plant which grew up quickly in the furrows of fields, and may have been the poppy; but nothing more than conjecture is possible. The vinegar mingled with gall (Mat. 27:34) may have been an acid wine mingled with myrrh (Mar. 15:23).

gaze, Ex. 19: 21; Ac. 1: 11.

gazelle. The English word gazelle does not occur in the A.V., the Hebrew word being translated "roe" or "roebuck," but in the R.V. the word "gazelle" is used. There can be little doubt that the animal intended is the dorcas gazelle (Gazella dorcas), which is still abundant in Palestine. Its flesh was largely consumed as food; its beauty, gentleness, and swiftness of foot are frequently referred to in the Bible.

General Epistles, The.
St. James and the six writings which follow it constitute the group known as "The Catholic Epistles." They are called "Catholic" or "General," because they are not addressed to any particular church, but to a wide circle of readers. St. Paul had written to seven churches—Thessalonica, Corinth, Galatia, Rome, Philippi, Colossæ, Ephesus; and here we have seven epistles without address to any particular church; therefore, they may be called "General," or "Catholic." This group was anciently placed immediately after the Acts, a place which suits their character very well; and in the group itself the Epistle of St. James has almost always stood first.

Genesis.
Name.—The word 'Genesis,' signifying generation or origin, is the title the book bears in the LXX. version, evidently with an allusion to its contents. Its Hebrew name is 'Bereshith' [in the beginning].
Authorship.—Formerly the book was assumed to be by Moses, and that opinion is still held by many. But recent scholars find in it a series of documents and believe that the book was first put into written form, though from earlier documents, in the eighth century B.C.
Contents.—The subject is the origin and early history of the Israelites. (1) The introduction, Ch. 1-11. (2) The life of Abraham, 11: 27-25: 18. (3) The life of Isaac, 25: 19-28: 9. (4) The life of Jacob, 28: 10-28: 1. The life of Joseph, 28: 2; 50: 26.

gold (Heb., 'zāhab'; aurum), I. Ki. 9: 28. There are six different names for gold used in the Bible, besides various qualifying terms prefixed to 'zāhab.' These names refer to the characteristics or various attributes of gold, and testify to the high position of esteem which it occupied. As a medium of exchange, by weight, it was used in the time of Abraham, but does not appear to have been actually coined till the time of Ezra. There is no indication of its having been obtained in Palestine, but some may have come from Egypt or even Midian. The Jews were mainly dependent however, on supplies from Arabia (Sheba), Africa, and Ophir on the west coast of India.

Gospels, The Four.
The central fact of Christian preaching was the intelligence that the Saviour had come into the world (Matt. 4: 23; Rom. 10: 15); and the first Christian preachers who called their account of the person and mission of Christ by the term 'euangelion' (= good message) were called 'euangelistai' (= evangelists) (Eph. 4: 11; Ac. 21: 8).

There are four historical accounts of the person and work of Christ: "the first by Matthew, announcing the Redeemer as the promised King of the kingdom of God; the second by Mark, declaring him 'a prophet, mighty in deed and word;' the third by Luke, of whom it might be said that he represents Christ in the special character of the Saviour of sinners (Luke 7: 36; 15: 18); the fourth by John, who represents Christ as the Son of God, in whom deity and humanity become one. The ancient Church gave to Matthew the symbol of the lion, to Mark that of a man, to Luke that of an ox, and to John that of the eagle: these were the four faces of the cherubim" (Eze. 1: 10). But often the symbols of Matthew and Mark are interchangeable, e. g. in St. Mark's cathedral at Venice, the symbol of Mark is the lion.

Date.—The Gospels were all composed during the latter part of the first century, and there is distinct historical evidence to show that they were used and accepted as authentic before the end of the second century.

Mutual relation.—"If the extent of all the coincidences be represented by 100, their proportionate distribution will be: Matthew, Mark, and Luke, 53; Matthew and Luke, 21; Matthew and Mark, 20; Mark and Luke, 6. Looking only at the general result, it may be said that of the contents of the synoptic Gospels [i. e., the first three Gospels] about two-fifths are common to the three, and that the parts peculiar to one or other of them are little more than one-third of the whole."

Origin.—Did the evangelists copy from one another? The opinion is well founded that the Gospels were published by the apostles orally before they were committed to writing, and that each had an independent origin.

gourd. There is uncertainty as to what plant is referred to in Jon. 4: 6-10. In the East, or in warm countries, gourds are grown to cover booths or arbors. They grow up rapidly, and a grub destroying the root would cause the whole stem and foliage to quickly wither.

gourd, wild, II. Ki. 4: 39. Probably the 'Citrullus colocynthis,' or colocynth, which is common in Palestine, and of bitter taste.

Habakkuk, Book of.
Author and Date.—Nothing is known about the prophet outside the book itself. He belonged to the kingdom of Judah, and may have been either a priest or a member of the Levitical choir (3: 1, 3, 13-19). Most critics are of the opinion that Habakkuk wrote during the time of Jehoiakim

Habakkuk—Continued
(B C. 608-597), perhaps towards the beginning rather than the close of that monarch's reign. Some assign the prophecy to the time of Josiah (B.C. 639-608).
Contents.—The theme of the prophecy is the Chaldean invasion. The book is dramatically constructed in the form of a dialogue. Ch. 1: 2-4 contains the prophet's complaint, vs. 5-11 Jehovah's reply that judgment is near, and vs. 12-17 the prophet's reflections. In ch. 2 the prophet sets himself on the prophetic watch-tower, awaiting Jehovah's reply, by which he is assured that "the just shall live by his faith" (2: 4) and that the heathen (the Chaldeans), shall be humbled and brought to ruin. Ch. 3 is one of the finest examples of Hebrew lyric poetry.

Haggai, Book of.
Author.—The prophet Haggai was a contemporary of Zerubbabel, "the governor of Judah," with whom he returned to Jerusalem. Together with Zechariah the prophet (cf. Ezra 4: 24-5; 1, 2), he came forward in the second year of Darius (B.C. 520) to urge the people again to undertake the building of the temple, already commenced in the second year of Cyrus (B.C. 535), but abandoned, owing to the opposition met with (cf. Ezra 4 and 5). The exhortations of the two prophets were not without effect, and that work was completed at the expiration of four years (cf. Ezra 6: 14, 15).
Contents.—The prophecy is arranged chronologically, and consists of four parts. These were all delivered within the space of three months. (1) Ch. 1, an exhortation to build the temple—on the first day of the sixth month of the second year of Darius—and its result. (2) The glory of the new temple—on the twenty-first day of the seventh month (2: 1-9). (3) From the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month Jehovah promises to again bless his people with fruitful seasons (2: 10-19). (4) The prophet on the same day assures Zerubbabel that, amid the impending overthrow of the thrones and kingdoms of the heathen (2: 6), Jehovah will specially favor and protect him (2: 20-23). The book is remarkable as containing a distinct Messianic prophecy, referred to in Heb. 12: 26-28.

handicraft, Ac. 18: 3; 19: 25; Rev. 18: 22.

A trade was taught to all the Jewish boys, as a necessary part of their education. Even the greatest rabbis maintained themselves by trades. Says Rabbi Jehuda, "He who does not teach his son a trade is much the same as if he taught him to be a thief" In the present article brief notices only can be given of such handicraft trades as are mentioned in Scripture.

1. Smiths or metal-workers.—The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture or for domestic purposes was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labor; and together with iron, working in brass, or rather copper alloyed with tin (bronze), is mentioned as practised in antediluvian times, Gen. 4: 22. After the establishment of the Jews in Canaan, the occupation of a smith became recognized as a distinct employment, I. Sa. 13: 19. The smith's work and its results are often mentioned in Scripture, II. Sa. 12: 31; I. Ki. 6: 7; II. Chr. 26: 14; Isa. 44: 12; 54: 16. The worker in gold and silver must have found employment among both the Hebrews and the neighboring nations in very early times, Gen. 24: 22, 53; 35: 4; 38: 18. Various processes of the goldsmith's work are illustrated by Egyptian monuments. After the conquest frequent notices are found of both moulded and wrought metal, including soldering.

2. Carpenters are often mentioned in Scripture, Gen. 6: 14; Ex. 37; Isa. 44: 13. In the palace built by David for himself the workmen employed were chiefly foreigners, II. Sa. 5: 11. That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Isa. 41: 7; 44: 13. In the New Testament the occupation of a carpenter is mentioned in connection with Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, and ascribed to our Lord himself, Mat. 13: 55; Mar. 6: 3. The trade included our cabinet work as well as carpentering, but did not include house building, as houses were not made of wood.

3. The masons employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phœnicians, I. Ki. 5: 18; Eze. 27: 9. The large stones used in Solomon's temple are said by Josephus to have been fitted together exactly without either mortar or clamps, but the foundation stones to have been fastened with lead. For ordinary

building, mortar was used; sometimes, perhaps, bitumen, as was the case at Babylon, Gen. 11:3.
4. Ship-building must have been exercised to some extent for the fishing-vessels on the Lake of Gennesaret, Mat. 8:23; 9:1; John 21:3, 8. Solomon built ships for his foreign trade, I. Ki. 9:26, 27; 22:48; II. Chr. 20:36, 37.
5. Apothecaries or perfumers appear to have formed a guild or association, Ex. 30:25, 35; II. Chr. 16:14; Neh. 3:8; Ec. 7:1; 10:1.
6. Weavers.—The arts of spinning and weaving both wool and linen were carried on in early times, as they usually are still among the Bedouins, by women, Ex. 35:25, 26; Lev. 19:19; Deu. 22:11; II. Ki. 23:7; Eze. 16:16; Prov. 31:13, 24.
7. Dyeing and dressing cloth were practised in Palestine, as were also tanning and dressing leather, Josh. 2:15-18; II. Ki. 1:8; Mat. 3:4; Ac. 9:43.
8. Barbers, Nu. 6:5, 19; Eze. 5:1.
9. Tentmakers are noticed in Ac. 18:3.
10. Potters are frequently alluded to, Jer. 18:2-6.
11. Bakers are noticed in Scripture, Jer. 37:21; Hos. 7:4; and the well-known valley Tyropœon probably derived its name from the occupations of the cheese-makers, its inhabitants.
12. Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of I. Cor. 10:25.

head-dress. The Hebrews do not appear to have regarded a covering for the head as an essential article of dress. Hats were unknown. The earliest notice we have of such a thing is in connection with the sacerdotal vestments. Ex. 28:40. The 'tsânîph' (something like a turban) is noticed as being worn by nobles, Job 29:14, ladies, Isa. 3:23, and kings, Isa. 62:3; while the 'peêr' was an article of holiday dress, Isa. 61:3, A.V. "beauty," Eze. 24:17, 23, and was worn at weddings, Isa. 61:10. The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the 'keffieh,' a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down over the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord. It is not improbable that a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions. The word rendered "hats" in Dan. 3:21 properly applies to a 'cloak'

Hebrews, Epistle to the.
For Whom Written.—The title "To Hebrews" is very ancient, but is probably not original. The addition of "The Epistle" describes the writing fairly well; but until near the end of it, it is more of an essay than a letter. The writer himself calls it a "word of exhortation" (13:22). The writing is not addressed to Hebrews generally, but to some definite community of Hebrew Christians in which there were few or no Gentiles. Probably the Christians at Jerusalem, or at some other place in Palestine, ought to be regarded as the first recipients of the treatise. It was here that the temptation to apostatize and go back to Judaism was specially great; and the writer again and again warns his readers against this danger as one of a really awful character (2:1-4; 3:6, 14; 4:1, 14; 6:1-8; 10:23, 26-31; 12:13, 16, 17).
Date and Place.—The epistle was certainly written before the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70); and 12:4 suggests that neither the Neronian persecution nor the martyrdom of James the Just had taken place. If so, the treatise cannot be later than A.D. 62.
The place from which the author wrote is quite uncertain. "They of Italy salute you" (13:24) may mean, either that people in Italy send greetings to the recipients of the epistle, or that people from Italy, i. e., Italians who are away from their home, send greetings.
Authorship.—The chief question regarding this epistle is the author, about whom we must still confess, as Origen did more than sixteen centuries ago, "Who wrote the epistle, God alone knows." In the earliest Greek MSS. it is placed among the epistles of St. Paul. The Syriac, later Greek, and Latin MSS. place it where we have it, as an appendix to the Pauline collection. The different portions of the church were not agreed regarding it. St. Paul, St. Luke, Apollos, and Barnabas have all been accredited with the authorship.
Two things are certain: The writer was not St. Paul, who did not have the gospel "confirmed unto him by them that heard" (2:3), but by Jesus Christ himself (Gal. 1:1); and the writer was under strong Pauline influence, as the whole treatise shows. Several other things are probable. The writer was a born Jew; a Hellenist, well versed in the Septuagint and in the Alexandrian type of Jewish theology; a companion of Paul and a friend of Timothy, but working independently of the apostle; a person with a keen interest in the Hebrews of Palestine. About author, place, and exact date of the epistle we must be content to remain in uncertainty. However, its apostolic power and inspiration, and its right to a place in company with the writings of apostles, are indisputable.
Summary.—There is no Pauline salutation or thanksgiving; the writer goes direct to his main thesis: The finality of the revelation made by the Son, who is superior to the angels (chs. 1, 2); Moses and Joshua, the founders of the old dispensation, Jesus the founder of the new (chs. 3, 4); the universal and absolute high-priesthood of Christ (chs. 5-7); Christ's priesthood the fulfilment of Jewish expectations (8:1-10:18); exhortations to use their privileges, to remember the triumphs hell. In the Old Testament this is the word generally and unfortunately used by our translators to render the Hebrew 'Sheol.' It really means the place of the dead, the unseen world, without deciding whether it be the place of misery or of happiness. It is clear that in many passages of the Old Testament 'Sheol' can only mean "the grave," and is so rendered in the A.V.; see, for example, Gen. 37:35; 42:38; I. Sa. 2:6; Job 14:13. In other passages, however, it seems to involve a notion of punishment, and is therefore rendered in the A.V. by the word 'hell.' But in many cases this translation misleads the reader. In the New Testament 'hell' is the translation of two words, 'Hades' and 'Gehenna.' The word Hades, like Sheol, sometimes means merely 'the grave,' Ac. 2:31; I. Cor. 15:55; Rev. 20:13, or in general 'the unseen world.' It is in this sense that the creeds say of our Lord, 'He descended into hell,' meaning the state of the dead in general, without any restriction of happiness or misery. Elsewhere in the New Testament Hades is used of a place of torment, Matt. 11:23; Lu. 16:23; II. Pet. 2:4, etc.; consequently it has been the prevalent, almost the universal, notion that Hades is an intermediate state between death and resurrection, divided into two parts, one the abode of the blest and the other of the lost. It is used eleven times in the New Testament, and only once translated "grave," I. Cor. 15:55. The word most frequently used (occurring twelve times) in the New Testament for the place of future punishment is 'Gehenna' or 'Gehenna of fire.' This was originally the valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem, where the filth and dead animals of the city were cast out and burned; a fit symbol of the wicked and their destruction.

Hellenists or Grecians. The Jews in the New Testament period may be said to have been divided into two sections, Hebrews and 'Hellenists' The Hebrews were those whose ancestors had lived in Palestine for generations, who spoke the "Hebrew" or "Aramaic" language, and who were strict in their interpretation of the law. The Hellenists were foreign Jews, whose tongue was the Greek. The meaning of the word "Hellen" is "Greek;" and a Hellenist was a Grecian Jew. The term indicates not original ancestry, but the characteristics that resulted from contact with the Greek. The wide adoption of the Greek language, which became universal, had the greatest influence in impressing Greek ideas and customs upon the people. Hence there was a sort of dualistic Judaism.

Herodians. These were partisans of Herod Antipas, described by Josephus as "people who supported Herod's cause." Outwardly they maintained a friendly attitude to the Romans. They were developed naturally from the Sadducees. They saw through Herod a possibility of preserving Jewish national existence, notwithstanding the Roman control. Like Herod, they were not closely observant of the Mosaic requirements, and were ready for any compromise that was necessary between their faith and the civilization of which Herod was the representative. They did not form a strong party, and their impress upon the community was neither great nor enduring.

high priest. The first distinct separation of Aaron to the office of the priesthood, which previously belonged to the first-born, was that recorded Ex. 28. We find from the very first the following characteristic attributes of Aaron and the high priests his successors, as distinguished from the other priests: Aaron alone was anointed, Lev. 8: 12, whence one of the distinctive epithets of the high priest was "the anointed priest," Lev. 4: 3, 5, 16; 21: 10; see Nu. 35: 25. The high priest had a peculiar dress, which passed to his successor at his death. This dress consisted of several parts, of which the most important are here named: (a) The breastplate, or, as it is further named, Ex: 28 15, 29, 30, the breastplate of judgment. The breastplate was originally two spans long and one span broad, but when doubled it was square, the shape in which it was worn. On it were the twelve precious stones, set in four rows, three in a row, thus corresponding to the twelve tribes—each stone having the name of one of the children of Israel engraved upon it. (b) The ephod.

A Breastplate.

This consisted of two parts, of which one covered the back and the other the front, i. e. the breast and upper part of the body. These parts were clasped together on the shoulder with two large onyx stones, each having engraved on it six of the names of the tribes of Israel. They were further united by a "curious girdle" of gold, blue, purple, scarlet and fine twined linen round the waist. The high priest alone was permitted to enter the holy of holies, which he did once a year, on the great day of atonement, when he sprinkled the blood of the sin offering on the mercy seat, and burnt incense within the veil, Lev. 16. The usual age for entering upon the functions of the priesthood, according to II. Chr. 31: 17, is considered to have been 20 years, though a priest or high priest was not actually incapacitated if he had attained to puberty. Again, according to Lev. 21: 17-21, no one that had a blemish could officiate at the altar.

horn. The word "horn" is often used metaphorically to signify strength and honor, because horns are the chief weapons and ornaments of the animals which possess them; hence they are also used as a type of victory. Of 'strength' the horn of the unicorn was the most frequent representative. Deut. 33: 17, etc., but not always; comp. I. Ki. 22: 11, where probably horns of iron, worn defiantly and symbolically on the head, are intended. Among the Druses upon Mount Lebanon the married women wear silver horns on their heads.

horse. The horse does not appear to have been known to the Israelites in the days of the patriarchs, but in Egypt it was known from a very remote antiquity. In their progress into Palestine the Jews found the Canaanites with horses and chariots (Josh. 11:4), and when David defeated the king of northeastern Syria he kept from the slaughter horses enough for a hundred chariots. (II. Sa. 8:4.) A little later, King Solomon had 12,000 cavalry horses. All through the Bible we read of horses in connection with war; the ass and the ox were kept for more peaceful labors.

Hosea (hō-sē'ȧ) [deliverance], a prophet of Israel, Hos. 1:1.

Hosea, Book of.
Author.—Hosea, the son of Beeri, was a native of the northern kingdom, where he prophesied under Jeroboam and the succeeding kings. He was a young contemporary of Amos, whose book he seems to have known (cf. Hos. 4:3 with Am. 8:8, and Hos. 8:14 with Am. 1:5, 7, 10, 12, etc.).
Contents.—The book falls into two parts. (1) Chs. 1-3 belong to the closing years of the reign of Jeroboam II. These chapters describe Israel's unfaithfulness towards God, and his patient and never-failing love towards his people. Israel's infidelity towards God is vividly illustrated by the sad details of the prophet's domestic life—his marriage with an unchaste wife, her continued misconduct, chastisement, and final return to her husband's home. Others consider that section merely symbolical, and regard the description of the prophet's life as a mere imaginary picture. (2) Chs. 4-14 describe Israel's moral decadence—people and priests alike are utterly corrupt (chs. 4-8); in consequence, punishment is threatened (chs. 9-11); but if Israel will renounce their sins, and turn in penitence to Jehovah, he will receive, forgive, and again bless them (chs. 12-14).

house. The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia and Persia, are generally mere huts of mud or sunburnt bricks. In some parts of Palestine and Arabia stone is used, and in certain districts caves in the rocks are used as dwellings. Am. 5: 11. The houses are usually of one story only, viz., the ground floor, and often contain only one apartment. Sometimes a small court for the cattle is attached; and in some cases the cattle are housed in the same building, or the people live on a raised platform, and the cattle round them on the ground. I. Sam. 28: 24. The windows are small apertures high up in the walls, sometimes grated with wood. The roofs are commonly but not always flat, and are usually formed of a plaster of mud and straw laid upon boughs or rafters and upon the flat roofs, tents or "booths" of boughs or rushes are often raised to be used as sleeping-places in summer. The difference between the poorest houses and those of the class next above them is greater than between these and the houses of the first rank. The prevailing plan of Eastern houses of this class presents, as was the case in ancient Egypt, a front of wall, whose blank and mean appearance is usually relieved only by the door and a few latticed and projecting windows. Within this is a court or courts with apartments opening into them. Over the door is a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought which, except in times of public celebrations, is usually closed, II. Ki. 9: 30. An awning is sometimes drawn over the court, and the floor strewed with carpets on festive occasions. The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court. Around part, if not the whole, of the court is a veranda, often nine or ten feet deep, over which, when there is more than one floor, runs a second gallery of like depth, with a balustrade. When there is no second floor, but more than one court

the women's apartments—'hareem, harem or haram'—are usually in the second court; otherwise they form a separate building within the general enclosure, or are above on the first floor. When there is an upper story, the 'ka'ah' forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the "upper room," which was often the guest-chamber. Lu. 22:12; Ac. 1:13; 9:37; 20:8. Paul preached in such a room on account of its superior size and retired position. The outer circle in an audience in such a room sat upon a dais, or upon cushions elevated so as to be as high as the window-sill.

hyssop. The 'ēzōb' was used for sprinkling in some of the sacrifices and purifications of the Jews. The common hyssop is a shrub with low, bushy stalks 1½ feet high, small pear-shaped, close-setting opposite leaves, all the stalks and branches terminated by erect whorled spikes of flowers of different colors in the varieties. It is a hardy plant, with an aromatic smell and a warm, pungent taste; a native of the south of Europe and the East.

inn. The Hebrew word 'mâlôn' thus rendered literally signifies "a lodging-place for the night." Inns, in our sense of the term, were, as they still are, unknown in the East, where hospitality is religiously practiced. The khans or caravanserais are the representatives of European inns, and these were established but gradually. The halting-place of a caravan was selected originally on account of its proximity to water or pasture, by which the travellers pitched their tents and passed the night. Such was undoubtedly the "inn" at which occurred the incident in the life of Moses narrated in Ex. 4:24; comp. Gen. 42:27. On the more frequented routes, remote from towns, Jer. 9:2, caravanserais were in course of time erected, often at the expense of the wealthy. "A caravanserai is a large and substantial square building. Passing through a strong gateway, the guest enters a large court in the centre of which is a spacious raised platform, used for sleeping upon at night or for the devotions of the faithful during the day. Around this court are arranged the rooms inspiration. Dr. Knapp gives as the definition of inspiration, "an extraordinary divine agency upon teachers while giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught what and how they should write or speak." Without deciding on any of the various theories of inspiration, the general doctrine of Christians is that the Bible is so inspired by God that when rightly interpreted it is the infallible guide of men in all matters of religious faith and practice.

Inspiration and Biblical Criticism.—Biblical criticism investigates the human form of the Bible and does not interfere with its divine contents. It is twofold: (1) Verbal or textual (also called lower) criticism aims to restore the original text of the Scripture from the existing sources (manuscripts, ancient versions, and patristic quotations). (2) Literary or historical (also called higher) criticism investigates the authorship, time and place, historical environments and fortunes of the several books of the Old and New Testaments.

Isaiah.
Author.—Little is known of the details of Isaiah's life. From the book itself we learn that he received the prophetic call in the last year of King Uzziah's reign (6:1), and prophesied during the reigns of the three following kings, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (1:1). He was the son of Amoz (a name distinct from that of the prophet Amos), who is otherwise unknown; he was married (8:3), and had (at least) two sons (7:3-8:1-4). Assuming that he was twenty or twenty-one years old when he began his prophetic career, he must have been over eighty years of age when he died, or suffered martyrdom (cf. Heb. 11:37), shortly after Manasseh's accession to the throne.

Authorship.—The question of the authorship of the second part of the book has been discussed by many scholars, though none doubt the inspiration. The difference in the prophet's standpoint, the dissimilarity in thought and language in the second portion of the book, and the marked advance in the writer's theology in chs. 40-66, as compared with the passages that are undoubtedly Isaiah's, have led many modern scholars to assume that the last chapters were not composed by Isaiah, but by some unknown prophet, who wrote after the exile, but before the restoration.

Contents.—The book falls into two main divisions, (1) chs. 1-39 and (2) chs. 40-66. (1) The former refers for the most part to the kingdom of Assyria, the latter to that of Babylonia. The first part may be subdivided as follows: (a) Chs. 1-6, prophecies against the sinful and idolatrous people. (b) Chs. 7-12, prophecies belonging to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitish war; the prophecy of Immanuel, and the downfall of the Assyrians. (c) Chs. 13-23, prophetic utterances relating chiefly to foreign nations, viz.: chs. 12-14:23, against Babylon; ch. 14:24-27, against the Assyrian; ch. 14:28-32, against Philistia; chs. 15 and 16, against Moab; ch. 17, against Damascus; ch. 18, concerning Ethiopia; ch. 19, against Egypt; ch. 20, against Ashdod; ch. 21, on Babylon, Dumah (Edom), and Arabia. In ch. 22:1-14 the prophet rebukes the attitude of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and in vs. 15-25 announces the downfall of Shebna, the treasurer (this chapter is perhaps inserted here owing to the similarity of its title to that of ch. 21); ch. 23, on Tyre. (d) Chs. 24-27 form a single prophecy, announcing God's judgment upon the world, and the establishment of his kingdom in Jerusalem. (e) Chs. 28-33 are a group of prophecies against Samaria and Judah, in which the prophet condemns the policy of relying on Egypt for help, and describes the overthrow of Sennacherib and the deliverance of Jerusalem. (f) Chs. 34 and 35, judgment on the nations (with special reference to Edom), and the joyous return of Israel to its fatherland. (g) Chs. 36-39, an historical section, identical in the main with II. Ki. 18-20. Ch. 39:9-20 contains the psalm of Hezekiah, not found in the parallel section in II. Kings. (2) The second part of Isaiah is a continuous prophecy (chs. 40-66), the subject of which is the restoration of Israel from the Babylonian captivity. It may be subdivided into three parts: (a) Chs. 40-48, in which the prophet emphasizes the certainty of the approaching release from exile, assures the people that nothing can hinder their deliverance, and in proof of this statement points out the power of Jehovah to fulfil his promises, and the impotence of the gods of the heathen. (b) Chs. 49-57, the prophecy of the servant of Jehovah, his sufferings and glory. This title has three different applications. It is used of Israel in general (e. g., 42: 19) of the righteous in Israel (cf. 44: 1, 2, 21), and of the personal Messiah (chs. 49-57; cf. 42: 1-43: 10). (c) Chs. 58-66, the restoration of Zion, the felicity of the Israelites admitted to be its citizens, and the condemnation and overthrow of the enemies of Jehovah.

James, Epistle of.
  Author.—There is scarcely any doubt that the writer was James the Just, the brother of the Lord and the first overseer of the church of Jerusalem. As such he had very great influence, and was regarded as of apostolic rank. As the brother of the Lord he had been much in the society of Christ before he had learned to believe on him; and this accounts for the numerous reminiscences of Christ's words which we find in his epistle, and which seem to be independent of the reports of his words contained in the Gospels.

Date.—James was put to death in A.D. 62 or 63, and therefore his letter cannot be placed later than that date, at which time possibly none of our Gospels were in circulation.
Character.—The letter is addressed to the Christian Jews of the Dispersion, i. e., the Jews outside Palestine, especially in Syria and Egypt. Here and there perhaps the writer turns aside and addresses unconverted Jews (4:1-4; 5:1-6); but the letter as a whole is addressed to humble and suffering communities of Jewish Christians.
Summary.—The letter has no plan, and scarcely admits of analysis. It begins and ends with exhortations to patience and practical piety (1:2-27; 5:7-20), while the central portion (2:1-5:6) is largely taken up with rebukes. "Deeds, not words" is the theme all through. The readers are warned against barren orthodoxy, deadly covetousness, and presumptuous wordliness, and are comforted under present and threatening temptations and sufferings.

Jasper, jade (?), Ex. 28:20; Rev. 21:11. Although this word is translated by "jasper" in the A.V., it seems to be open to question whether, in part at least, the mineral we know as jasper was really intended. Jasper is not a translucent stone, yet in Rev. 21:11 reference is made to jasper "clear as crystal"; this suggests a fine variety of jade or nephrite. It is known to have been held in the highest esteem in the earliest times. Eze. 28:13; Rev. 4:3; 21:18, 19.

Jehoshuah (jē-hŏsh'u-ah), I. Chr. 7:27.
Jehovah (I am; the eternal living one). The Scripture appellation of the supreme Being, usually interpreted as signifying self-derived and permanent existence. The Jews scrupulously avoided every mention of this name of God, substituting in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel-points it may happen to be written. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name which he should give as the credentials of his mission: "And God said unto Moses, 'I am that I am'; and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you." That this passage is intended to indicate the etymology of Jehovah, as understood by the Hebrews, no one has ventured to doubt. While Elohim exhibits God displayed in his power as the creator and governor of the physical universe, the name Jehovah designates his nature as he stands in relation to man, as the only almighty, true, personal, holy Being, a spirit and "the father of spirits," Nu. 16:22; cf. John 4:24, who revealed himself to his people, made a covenant with them, and became their lawgiver, and to whom all honor and worship are due. It is believed that the correct pronunciation of this word is 'Yahweh.'

Jeremiah, Book of.

Author.—Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah, "one of the priests that were in Anathoth," a town in the tribe of Benjamin, a short distance north of Jerusalem. He was a young man (1: 6) when he made his first appearance as a prophet, in the thirteenth year of King Josiah (626 B.C.; cf. 1: 2; 25: 3), and prophesied chiefly in Jerusalem, although from chs. 11: 21 and 37: 12 he does not seem to have severed his connection with his native place, Anathoth. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, he resided in Mizpah (40: 6), and after the murder of Gedaliah was carried off against his will to Egypt (43: 6 ff.), where, according to a later tradition, he was stoned to death by the Jews, at Tahpanhes or Daphne, on account of his prophecies.

Occasion.—The prophet was much impressed by the sad scenes that he saw. The backsliding and lapses into sin on the part of Israel, the refusal to give heed to the warnings uttered, the persecutions and trials to which he was subjected at the hands of his fellow countrymen, are all reflected in Jeremiah's writings. He foresaw the ruin of his country, and lamented it bitterly. His patriotism was great, and the accusations brought against him by those whom he warned of impending disaster were quite destitute of foundation (cf. ch. 9). He persisted in his warnings and exhortations, looking forward in hope to the renewal of God's covenant with his people, and the restoration that he predicted for his chosen people Israel. The Messiah is alluded to in chs. 23: 5-8; 30: 4-11; 33: 14-26, but less is said regarding his personality than we find in the other prophets.

Summary.—The book may be divided into two parts: (1) Chs. 1-45 comprise for the most part prophecies relating to Judah and the kingdom of God. They also contain much information respecting the personal history of the prophet, and the events that happened during his ministry (cf. 11: 21; 20: 1-3; 26, 28, 36-43: 8). (2) Chs. 46-51 consist of nine discourses against foreign nations, together with ch. 52, which was undoubtedly added at a later date (after B.C. 562, as is clear from 51: 64 compared with 52: 31 ff.), and which exhibits a close resemblance to II. Ki. 24: 18-25: 30. The prophecies, as we now have them, do not appear to be arranged in chronological order.

Jerusalem [the habitation of peace]. Jerusalem stands in latitude 31° 46′ 45″ north and longitude 35° 18′ 25″ east of Greenwich. It is 32 miles distant from the sea and 18 from the Jordan, 20 from Hebron and 36 from Samaria. Jerusalem, if not actually in the centre of Palestine, was yet virtually so. "It was on the ridge, the broadest and most strongly-marked ridge of the backbone of the complicated hills which extend through the whole country from the plain of Esdraelon to the desert."

Topography.—We may say, roughly, that the city occupies the southern termination of a table-land which is cut off from the country round it on its west, south and east sides by ravines more than usually deep and precipitous. These ravines leave the level of the table-land, the one on the west and the other on the northeast of the city, and fall rapidly until they form a junction below its southeast corner. The eastern one—the valley of the Kedron, commonly called the valley of Jehoshaphat—runs nearly straight from north to south. But the western one—the valley of Hinnom—runs south for a time, and then takes a sudden bend to the east until it meets the valley of Jehoshaphat, after which the two rush off as one to the Dead Sea. The promontory thus encircled is itself divided by a longitudinal ravine running up it from south to north, called the valley of the Tyropœon, rising gradually from the south, like the external ones, till at last it arrives at the level of the upper plateau, dividing the central mass into two unequal portions. Of these two, that on the west is the higher and more massive, on which the city of Jerusalem now stands, and in fact always stood. The hill on the east is considerably lower and smaller, so that to a spectator from the south the city appears to slope sharply toward the east. The name of 'Mount Zion' has been applied to the western hill from the time of Constantine to the present day. The eastern hill, called 'Mount Moriah' in II. Chr. 3:1, was, as already remarked, the site of the temple. It was situated in the southwest angle of the area, now known as the Haram area, and was, as we learn from Josephus, an exact square of a stadium, or 600 Greek feet, on each side. Attached to the northwest angle of the temple was the Antonia, a tower or fortress. North of the site of the temple is the building now known to Christians as the Mosque of Omar, but by Moslems called the Dome of the Rock. The southern continuation of the eastern hill was named 'Ophel' which gradually came to a point at the junction of the valleys Tyropœon and Jehoshaphat; and the northern 'Bezetha,' "the new city," first noticed by Josephus, which was separated from Moriah by an artificial ditch, and overlooked the valley of Kedron on the east; this hill was enclosed within the walls of Herod Agrippa. Lastly, 'Acra' lay westward of Moriah and northward of Zion, and formed the "lower city" in the time of Josephus.

Jerusalem—Continued

Pools and Fountains.—Outside the walls on the west side were the Upper and Lower Pools of 'Gihon,' the latter close under Zion, the former more to the northwest, on the Jaffa road. At the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and Jehoshaphat was 'Enrogel,' the "Well of Job," in the midst of the king's gardens. Within the walls, immediately north of Zion, was the "Pool of Hezekiah." A large pool existing beneath the temple (referred to in Eccles. 1:3) was probably supplied by some subterranean aqueduct. The "King's Pool" was probably identical with the "Fountain of the Virgin," at the southern angle of Moriah. From this a subterranean channel cut through the solid rock leads the water to the pool of 'Siloah' or 'Siloam,' which has also acquired the character of being an intermittent fountain. The pool to which tradition has assigned the name of 'Bethesda' is situated on the north side of Moriah; it is now named 'Birket Israil.'

Population.—Taking the area of the city enclosed by the two old walls at 750,000 yards, and that enclosed by the wall of Agrippa at 1,500,000 yards, we have 2,250,000 yards for the whole. Taking the population of the old city at the probable number of one person to 50 yards, we have 15,000 and at the extreme limit of 30 yards we should have 25,000 inhabitants for the old city, and at 100 yards to each individual in the new city about 15,000 more; so that the population of Jerusalem, in its days of greatest prosperity, may have amounted to from 30,000 to 45,000 souls, but could hardly ever have reached 50,000; and assuming that in times of festivals one-half was added to this amount, which is an extreme estimate, there may have been 60,000 or 70,000 in the city when Titus came up against it. The present population is not far from 50,000; of which about half is within the walls of the city.

Job, Book of.

Character of the Book.—Job was a non-Israelite, a dweller in the land of Uz (probably near Edom, on the east or northeast), a man of wealth and exemplary piety. That Job was an historical character is clear from Eze. 14: 14, where he is mentioned with Noah and Daniel. Whether the contents of the book are also historical is not so clear. The view commonly adopted is that the book is an inspired poem, based on actual occurrences.

Author and Date.—Nothing can be affirmed with certainty as to the authorship or date of the poem. Some have supposed that the work was composed by Moses, but few at present hold that opinion. It may be described as an attempt to solve the problem why the righteous suffer. To the ordinary Hebrew suffering and misfortune seemed to be the punishment of special sin. But since the ungodly are not always punished for their offences, while the righteous are frequently visited with grievous trials, a serious difficulty presented itself. The book of Job seems written to point out that such suffering is often permitted as a test of faith and a means of grace.

Contents.—The book may be divided into five sections: (1) Chs. 1 and 2, the prologue, written in prose, describe the piety and prosperity of Job. The overthrow of Job's prosperity was permitted in order to test his character, and Job's continued trust in God in spite of overwhelming sorrows is narrated. There follows an account of the visit of three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, who, having heard of his affliction, come to condole with him. (2) Chs. 3-31 describe a discussion between Job and his friends written in poetry. The discussion consists of three sets of speeches, (a) chs. 4-14, (b) chs. 15-21, and (c) chs. 22-31, each set containing six speeches, one by each of the three friends, with Job's reply. (3) The speeches of Elihu, chs. 32-37, are also, with the exception of the opening verses (32: 1-6), in poetry. (4) Chs. 38-42: 6 are also poetical. Jehovah, in his speech out of the storm, makes no allusion to Job's case, accuses the patriarch of no hidden crimes, and does not explain the cause of his misfortunes. The answer of the Lord is sufficient for Job. He humbly confesses that God is omnipotent and omnipresent, and repents his former utterances and demeanor "in dust and ashes." (5) The book concludes with the epilogue, ch. 42: 7-17, written in prose. In this the conduct of the three friends is condemned by the Almighty, who restores Job to greater prosperity than he had enjoyed before.

Joel, Book of.

Author.—Nothing is known about this prophet beyond the name of his father, Pethuel. He was presumably a Judean, and possibly prophesied in Jerusalem, being perhaps priest as well as prophet. It is a common opinion that he prophesied in the early years of King Joash of Judah (c. 837-801 B.C.). Amos apparently was acquainted with the book of Joel (cf. 3: 16 and Amos 1: 2; 3: 18; 9: 13).

Contents.—The book may be divided into two parts (1) Chs. 1: 1-2: 17, a lamentation over the devastating plague, and an exhortation from the prophet to the people to repent and turn again to Jehovah. (2) Ch. 2: 18 to end, the answer to the prayer, and the promise of blessings in the future, God will pour out his Spirit on all flesh, will bring back those led captive from Judah and Jerusalem in Zion. With regard to the date of this book, authorities are almost equally divided in their opinions whether it should be regarded as one of the very earliest or one of the very latest of the prophetical books, as late as the time after the return from captivity.

John, Gospel according to.

Author.—As the Gospels surpass all other books, so the other Gospels are surpassed by the Gospel of St. John, "the most influential book in all literature." That it is by St. John has been the conviction of all who have known it, with very insignificant exception, down to the end of the eighteenth century. The best scholars are fully agreed that the fourth Gospel is by St. John, the apostle.

Date.—How late John wrote his Gospel cannot be determined, but probably between A.D. 80 and 95. Tradition says that he wrote at the request of his fellow disciples and elders of Ephesus.

Source.—The fourth Gospel is not composite like the other three. Although it comes last, and the author of it knew the writings of his predecessors, it is the most original of them all. He writes from personal knowledge; "that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life. . . . declare we unto you." He has no genealogy of Christ, no record of the birth, infancy, baptism, temptation, transfiguration, or ascension, no healing of demoniacs, no Sermon on the Mount, no parables. Instead of these we have the pre-existence of the Word, the incarnation, the new birth of the Spirit, the water of life, the bread of life, the good shepherd, and the true vine. Where he traverses exactly the same ground as the synoptists, as in the feeding of the five thousand, and in the history of the passion and resurrection, he adds various details of great interest, which come from his personal knowledge. Perhaps the chief of these are the farewell discourses of Christ to his disciple just before the crucifixion. The difference between these and those in the other Gospels is very great, and is to be explained partly by the difference of the occasions and audience, partly by the element in them which comes from St. John himself.

Object.—St. John writes for adult Christians, to confirm them in the belief that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," that by believing they "may have life in his name" (20:31). His is the spiritual Gospel, abounding in symbolism, saturated with the O.T., and stern in its condemnation of those whose misconception of the O.T. led them to reject the Messiah.

Characteristics.—The difference between these contents and those of the synoptic Gospels is great, and we need not doubt that part of St. John's reason for selecting certain scenes was that they had not been previously recorded. The synoptists give us little more than one year of Christ's ministry, nearly all of which is in Galilee. John gives us nearly three years (2:13; 6:4; 13:1), with various sojourns at Jerusalem. But in the gaps in the synoptic narrative there is plenty of room for all that is peculiar to St. John, and in the gaps in his narrative for all that is peculiar to theirs. They imply several visits to Jerusalem (Mat. 23:37), although they do not record them. But he differs from them, not only in his choice of material, but in the view which he gives us of the Christ. They show us how the great Rabbi and Prophet exasperated the people by denouncing their immoral traditions and lives. John shows us how a divine personage infuriated the hierarchy by claiming to be one with Jehovah. They exhibit the teaching of Christ as simple, and for the most part moral, illustrated by frequent parables. John exhibits it as mystical and doctrinal, without parables, except three in the form of allegories. As already stated, there is in St. John's Gospel a large element which, although under the guidance of the Spirit, comes from himself.

Summary.—The main divisions of the Gospel are two, of which the first is preceded by a prologue of pregnant meaning, while the second is followed by an appendix of intense interest. The prologue sets forth the Word as a divine Person, the eternal Interpreter of the nature of God, the Creator of the universe, and the Fountain of life and light (1:1-18). The ministry is the revelation of the incarnate Son and his Father to the world (1:19-12:50). In the issues of the ministry a more complete revelation is made to the disciples (chs. 13-20). The appendix explains Christ's saying respecting the evangelist (ch. 21). The first main division seems to be divided into three parts at 2:11 and 11:57, and the second also at 17:26 and 19:42.

John, First Epistle of.

Author and Date.—It is admitted on all sides that I. John is by the author of the fourth Gospel, and that testimony to either book may be accepted as testimony to the other. The epistle was no doubt written at Ephesus, where St. John spent most of the last thirty years of his life; and it was probably written A.D. 85-95.

Characteristics.—The epistle is rightly called catholic, or general, as being addressed to the church at large. St. John may have had the Christians of Asia Minor specially in view when he wrote, but he does not specially address them, and the writing is more like a homily than a letter. It is a companion to the fourth Gospel, the thoughts and words of which it frequently reproduces. It refers to the Gospel, and comments on it repeatedly, with a view to confirming and enforcing it. The Gospel is historical, and only indirectly controversial; the epistle is moral and practical, and sometimes is intentionally polemical. The one exhibits the person of the Christ; the other sets forth the duty of the Christian, who will often have to oppose error.

Contents.—The epistle is much harder to analyze than the Gospel. The divisions melt into one another so that the transitions are scarcely perceptible. There is an introduction (1:1-4) and a conclusion (5:13-21). What lies between falls into two main divisions, the first of which (1:5-2:28) is influenced by the thought "God is light," the second (2:29-5:12) by the thought "God is love." It is possible to subdivide these; but it is difficult to say where each section begins and ends, and also to state satisfactorily the exact subject of each.

John, Second Epistle of.

Author and Date.—It is generally admitted that the Second and Third Epistles are by the same hand. "The elder" who wrote these reproduces the style of St. John with such marvelous felicity that it is reasonable to believe that they, as well as the First Epistle and the Gospel, are by the apostle. This letter was no doubt written from Ephesus during about the same period of St. John's life as the First Epistle.

Contents.—The Second Epistle may have been addressed either to a local church or to an individual woman. The latter alternative is the more probable, owing to the great similarity between the Second and Third epistles. But when we have decided that the "elect lady" (or the "elect Kyria," or the "lady Electa") is an actual person rather than a figurative name for a particular church, we must be content to know no more about her than the letter itself reveals. The apostle states that he has seen some of the lady's children, who, to his great joy, are leading Christian lives. But there are others of her children of whom this could not be said; and this painful fact makes him write to her before coming to visit her. Has she been indiscreet in exposing them to unsound teaching? Hospitality and benevolence ought not to be exercised in such a way as to further the success of evil.

John, Third Epistle of.

Date and Place.—The Third Epistle was written probably about the same time as the other two, and from the same place. It is addressed to Gaius, who seems to be a well-to-do layman.

Characteristics.—This epistle has importance far beyond its length. It professes to be written by a person of great authority, who speaks of opposition to himself as "prating against us with wicked words," and as conduct which cannot be passed over.

Contents.—He is commended for his hospitality, is warned not to imitate the intolerance of Diotrephes, and is told by way of contrast of the excellence of Demetrius, who is perhaps the bearer of the letter. The two contrasted characters are sketched in a few masterly touches with the same skill that is exhibited so often in the fourth Gospel. The hospitality which Gaius practiced and which Diotrephes forbade on pain of excommunication, was general in the primitive church (Rom. 12:13; I. Tim. 3:2; 5:10; Tit. 1:8; Heb. 13:2; I. Pet. 4:9); and at a very early date it began to be abused.

Jonah, Book of.

Jonah.—Jonah, the son of Amittai, mentioned in II. Ki. 14:25, was a native of Gath-Hepher in the tribe of Zebulon, and lived in the reign of Jeroboam II., shortly after the time of Elisha. He was therefore a contemporary of the prophet Amos. The book of Joshua does not claim to have been written by him.

Character.—The narrative srtikingly illustrates the conditional character of the judgments pronounced by divine command against nations. and even against Israel, which principle is also taught by Jeremiah (Jer. 18:10).

Historical Relation.—The main difficulty in the book of Jonah does not consist in the account of his having been swallowed by the great fish, but rather in the fact that no reference is made to any such conversion of Nineveh by Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Nahum, and the other prophets who prophesied concerning Assyria and Nineveh. The Assyrian inscriptions have confirmed the statements of the book concerning the exceeding great city Nineveh, but no reference has yet been discovered to Jonah's visit.

Contents.—The book is an historical narrative, giving an account of Jonah's call and disobedience (1:1-3), his punishment by being swallowed up by the great fish (1:4-17), the psalm composed in the fish's belly (2:1-9), his deliverance (2:10), his second call, obedience, and the success of his mission to Nineveh (3:1-10). The account of Jonah's indignation at the non-fulfilment of his predictions, and God's explanation of the mercy shown, close the book (4:1-11).

The psalm in ch. 2 is almost entirely composed of quotations from the Psalms, and from those of a late date.

Jonath-elem-rechokim (jō'nath-ĕ'lem-rē-kō'kim), "set to," occurs in the title of Ps. 56. The words signify, as explained in the margin of R.V., 'the silent dove of them that are afar off,' and the clause is explained in the LXX. and in the Targum as having reference to the state of Israel in captivity. If that view be adopted, the word preceding, "upon," should be translated "concerning." But it is more probably the first word of some popular song or psalm which has not come down to us, to the tune of which Ps. 56 was directed to be sung.

Its historic springs are at Banias (Cæsarea Philippi, Matt. 16:13; Mar. 8:27), at the foot of Hermon, about 600 feet above sea-level; geographically a longer stream (Nahr Hesbany) forms the real source on the west slopes of the same mountains, 1,700 feet above sea-level. It flows through two lakes, "the waters of Merom" (Josh. 11:7), about at the level of the sea, and ten miles below through the sea of Galilee, which is 682 feet below sea level, and enters into the Dead Sea. Its length is about 100 miles and its fall 2,000 feet. The modern name of the river is 'Esh Sheriah,' "the watering-place."

Name.—The book of 'Joshua' derives its name from Joshua, who led the Israelites into Canaan. In the Hebrew canon it is the first of the four books entitled the "Former Prophets," and is separated from the Pentateuch, of which it is in reality the concluding portion.
Author and Date.—The older commentators, both Jewish and Christian, regarded Joshua as the author. Modern scholars regard the book as of unknown authorship.
Contents.—The work may be divided into three parts: (1) Chs. 1-12 describe the conquest of the promised land, Canaan. (2) Chs. 13-22 record the division by lot of the land of Canaan among the nine tribes, and the half tribe of Manasseh. (3) Chs. 23 and 24 contain Joshua's last speeches and his death.

Jude, Epistle of.
The writer of this epistle is the brother of the writer of the Epistle of James; and both of them were brethren of the Lord. Religious feeling would deter them from stating this; and they knew that to be the "servant of Jesus Christ" was much more than being his actual brother (Lu. 11: 27, 28). The writer of the letter is evidently a Jewish Christian, who, while addressing all that are called, has Jewish Christians chiefly in his mind. It is possible that the letter was written about A. D. 66, from Jerusalem, though nothing is really known of the date and place.
Object.—As to its object, the letter itself informs us that, while St. Jude was intending to write a more comprehensive epistle, the entrance of ungodly men into the church caused him to write at once about the crisis which this disastrous invasion produced. All Christians must forthwith be urged to be unflinching in their defence of the truth against errors so monstrous and destructive as the libertinism which these intruders preached and practiced.
Summary.—(1) Salutation and reason (vs. 1-4); (2) historical argument regarding punishment and its application (vs. 5-10); (3) descriptions of the evil-doers, and applications of prophecy (vs. 11-19); (4) exhortation (vs. 20-23); (5) benediction and praise (vs. 24, 25).

judges. The judges were temporary and special deliverers, sent by God to deliver the Israelites from their oppressors; not supreme magistrates, succeeding to the authority of Moses and Joshua. Their power only extended over portions of the country, and some of them were ruling at the same time. Their first work was that of deliverers and leaders in war; they then Judges, Book of.

Name.—The book of Judges—called in the Hebrew 'Shofetim' (judges), a term identical with the Carthaginian 'Sufetes,' although the two offices were not of the same nature—derives its name from the histories contained therein.

Date and Authorship.—The author is uncertain. The book has been ascribed to Samuel, but others must have continued it. The song of Deborah (ch. 5) was composed in all probability shortly after the occurrence of the event described therein. The writer's thorough acquaintance with the topography of Palestine is sufficient to prove that the book was composed by an inhabitant of the country prior to the period of the exile.

Contents.—The book may be divided into three parts: (1) Chs. 1-2:5 are introductory, and contain an account of the conquest of certain portions of the land, and a list of the towns that were not then subdued, concluding with the rebuke administered to the Israelites at Bochim by the angel of Jehovah. (2) Chs. 2:6-16 contain the main portion of the narrative, from the death of Joshua until that of Samson, and are closely connected with Josh. 24:28. This part begins with an introduction explaining the spiritual significance of the events subsequently narrated. This is followed by the history of twelve or fifteen judges, about the majority of whom little is told. It is impossible to determine from the contents of the book itself, whether the judges named therein as the leaders of Israel ruled consecutively or contemporaneously. (3) Chs. 17-21 contain two appendices. The first describes the introduction of image worship by the Ephraimite Micah, and the conquest of Laish (Dan) by the Danites. The second records the shameful deed of the men of Gibeah, and the subsequent war which nearly annihilated the tribe of Benjamin.

judgment hall. The word 'prætorium' is so translated five times in the A.V. of the New Testament, and in those five passages it denotes two different places. (1) In John 18:28, 33; 19:9, it is the residence which Pilate occupied when he visited Jerusalem. The site of Pilate's prætorium in Jerusalem has given rise to much dispute, some supposing it to be the palace of King Herod, others the tower of Antonia;

but it was probably the latter, which was then and long afterward the citadel of Jerusalem. (2) In Ac. 23:35 Herod's judgment hall or prætorium in Cæsarea was doubtless a part of that magnificent range of buildings the erection of which by King Herod is described in Josephus. The word "palace," or "Cæsar's court," in the A.V. of Phil. 1:13, is a translation of the same word prætorium. It may here have denoted the quarter of that detachment of the prætorian guards which was in immediate attendance upon the emperor, and had barracks in Mount Palatine at Rome.

Fortress of Antonia; called Pilate's House.

Kings, Books of.
Name and Date.—These two books in Hebrew MSS. are regarded as one. In the editions of the LXX. and Vulgate they are entitled the third and fourth Kings. The present division into two books is of comparatively modern origin. The work was probably composed during the second half of the Babylonian captivity (after Evil-Merodach had ascended the throne; cf. II. Ki. 25:27 ff.).
Object.—The writer's object appears to have been not merely to communicate historical facts, but also to point out their bearing on matters of religion. The books of Kings contain the only record of the history of the northern kingdom after the separation from Judah, for the book of Chronicles only records the history of the northern kingdom in so far as connected with that of Judah.
Divisions.—The books may be divided into three parts: (1) I. Ki. 1:11, the reign of Solomon. (2) I. Ki. 12-11, Ki. 17, a parallel account of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel until the destruction of the kingdom of Israel. (3) II. Ki. 18:25, the history of the kingdom of Judah until the Babylonian exile.

Lamentations of Jeremiah.
Title and Author.—In the LXX., Targum, and Talmud, Jeremiah is regarded as the author of the book. This view is perhaps due to the resemblance the poems have to Jeremiah's prophecies, and is adopted by many modern scholars, but not by all. Most writers regard the authorship as unknown.
Summary.—The book consists of five separate poems, the subject of which is the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the misfortunes that followed that event. The first four poems are arranged alphabetically. In chs. 1, 2, and 4, each of which consists of twenty-two verses, the first letter of every verse commences with the corresponding letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Ch. 3 consists of sixty-six verses, and three verses, each beginning with the same letter, are assigned to each successive letter of the alphabet, so that there is a threefold alphabetical arrangement in that chapter. In ch. 5 there are twenty-two verses, but they are not arranged alphabetically.

languages of the Bible.
Hebrew.—Almost the whole of the Old Testament was written in Hebrew. The name is often derived from the word 'eber,' "beyond," containing a reminiscence of Abram's passing over the Euphrates in going to Canaan. Others derive it from Eber, or Heber, the great-grandson of Shem. Abraham is called "Eber" (Gen. 14: 13), which almost all the ancient and modern versions translate "the Hebrew" excepting the Septuagint, which gives it "the passer," and Luther, who translates it "the foreigner." It is now pretty generally held by scholars that Hebrew was not the language which Abram brought with him, but that he and his descendants adopted the language of the Canaanites, among whom they sojourned. The Hebrew, like the other Semitic languages, is not adapted to science and philosophy, but well suited to the expression of emotional, poetic, and religious sentiment. The languages of Europe have borrowed from the Hebrew a number of religious terms for which they had no equivalents. What the Hebrew lacks in grace it makes up in grandeur. While far less adapted than the Greek for the more philosophical and dialectical discussions of the doctrinal epistles, it was well adapted by its simplicity, directness, and grandeur to be the vechicle and repository of the earlier revelations of God to mankind. It is natural, childlike, picturesque, poetical, forcible, and majestic. Its sentences are never long and involved. There is but little of transposition, of involution. The Hebrew was spoken by the Jews until the destruction of Jerusalem, 587 B.C., when it became greatly tinged with Aramaic and presently was superseded by that tongue, though it continues to this day to be the sacred language, and the Law and Prophets are still read, as also their prayers and the Psalms are chanted in the synagogue services, in the original Hebrew. In some places the language is still spoken by learned Jews, and some periodicals are printed in that tongue.

Aramaic.—In the Old Testament Dan. 2: 4-4: 7; Ezra 4: 8-6: 18; 7: 12-26, and Jer. 10: 11, are written in Aramaic, formerly called Chaldee. After the Babylonian captivity the Aramaic displaced the Hebrew in Palestine, and continued to be the language of the Hebrews until their final national overthrow It was the native language of the Saviour and his apostles. A few Aramaic expressions are found in the New Testament, where it is called "Hebrew." (Mat. 5: 22; 6: 24; Lu. 16: 9, 13; Mat. 16: 17; Mat. 27: 46; Mar. 5: 41; 7: 34; 14: 36; John 1: 42; 19: 13; Ac. 1: 19; I. Cor. 16: 22.) This language was spoken in Mesopotamia, Syria and later in Palestine.

The New Testament Greek.—With the conquest of Alexander the Great, about 332 B.C., the Greek language began to be spoken over all the East as far as Babylon. The Jews extensively used it. The writings known as the Jewish Apocrypha, and the works of the two eminent Jewish writers, Philo and Josephus, were composed in Greek, and the Old Testament Scriptures themselves were translated into the same language and used everywhere in the synagogues. Naturally enough, the language as spoken and written by the Jews was not the pure idiom of the classical Greek. Indeed, the language acquired certain marked peculiarities which easily differentiate it from all the classical dialects. To this Jewish Greek there has been given the name Hellenistic Greek. Jewish ideas and idioms are expressed in Greek words. This is the basis of the Christian Greek, in which all the twenty-seven books of the New Testament were written.

Leviathan (lē-vī'a-than) [that which winds round]. In most of the places where this word occurs it evidently points to the crocodile, one of the great lizards. This reptile is to be found only in fresh water. It was once common in Eygpt, and possibly was not rare in some parts of Palestine. It has become almost extinct in the Holy Land. In Lam. 4:3, the A.V. has "sea-monsters," but the R.V., "jackals."

Leviticus, Book of.
Name and Peculiarity.—The name 'Leviticus' is a Latinized form of the Greek title in the LXX., meaning "pertaining to the Levites." The book contains for the most part laws, or collections of laws, but very little historical matter.
Contents.—It may be divided into four parts: (1) Chs. 1-7, laws relating to sacrifices in general. (2) Chs. 8-10, Aaron and his four sons consecrated to the priesthood; the transgression and punishment of Nadab and Abihu. (3) Chs. 11-16, laws concerning clean and unclean beasts; personal uncleanliness, with especial reference to leprosy; the day of atonement. (4) Chs. 17-27, various laws to be observed by Israel, God's chosen people, relating to sacrifices, chastity, marriage, religious and civil life; ordinances as to the priests, holy gifts and offerings, laws respecting festivals, the lighting of the sanctuary, and showbread; the story of a blasphemer and his punishment; the sabbatical year; the jubilee year; a chapter of blessings and cursings, and an appendix containing laws relating to vows, things devoted to Jehovah, and tithes.

lily. Although there is little doubt that the Hebrew word denotes some plant of the lily species, it is by no means certain what individual of this class it specially designates. The plant must have been a conspicuous object on the shores of the Lake of Gennesaret, Mat. 6: 28; Lu. 12: 27; it must have flourished in the deep broad valleys of Palestine, S. of S. 2: 1, among the thorny shrubs, S. of S. 2: 2, and pas ures of the desert, S. of S. 2: 16; 4: 5; 6: 3; and must have been remarkable for its rapid and luxuriant growth, Hos. 14: 5. That its flowers were brilliant in color would seem to be indicated in Mat. 6: 28, where it is compared with the gorgeous robes of Solomon; and that this color was scarlet or purple is implied in S. of S. 5: 13. There appears to be no species of lily which so completely answers all these requirements as the 'Lilium chalcedonicum,' or scarlet martagon, which grows in profusion in the Levant. It is very probable that the term 'lily' here is general, not referring to any particular species, but to a large class of flowers growing in Palestine and resembling the lily, as the tulip, iris, gladiolus, etc.

Scripture mentions three distinct kinds of linen and records the use of each kind, apparently, according to a well-defined intention: (1) The ordinary liner of plainest texture, Lev. 6: 10; Eze. 9: 2; Dan. 10: 5; Rev. 15: 6. (2) Linen of a superior fabric, Ex. 26: 1; 39: 27. (3) Linen of finest texture and costliest quality, Esth. 8: 15; I. Chr. 15: 27; Rev. 19: 8.

lion. The Hebrew has many words for this animal, which is mentioned in numerous passages and was at one time common in Palestine, but is now extinct. Lions were hunted and were also taken in pits (II. Sa. 23: 20). Their habits of lying in cover (Jer. 4: 7; 25: 38) and filling their holes with prey and their dens with ravin (Nah. 2: 12) are referred to as well known.

locust. This is the word used in describing the eighth plague of Egypt, and refers to the large migratory locust of old authors. These locusts are among the most voracious of insects, and at periods appear in such immense swarms as to darken the sky. When the swarms are feeding every green thing within reach is devoured, and the locusts then pass on to fresh pastures. This insect was and is used as an article of food.

Luke, the beloved physician, companion of Paul, Col. 4: 14; II. Tim. 4: 11; Phile. 24.

Luke, Gospel according to.

Author.—The name 'Luke,' or 'Lucas,' is an abbreviation, possibly of 'Lucilius,' but almost certainly of 'Lucanus.' Luke nowhere gives his name in either of the two writings which from the first have been assigned to him; but he is three times named by St. Paul (Col. 4: 10, 14; Phile. 24; II. Tim. 4: 11). These notices of him tell us that he was a Gentile and a physician, very dear to the apostle, as being his fellow worker in spreading the faith and his attendant in both his Roman imprisonments. In four other passages in the New Testament Luke, by using the first person, tells us a good deal about himself (Luke 1: 1-4; Ac. 16: 10-17; 20: 5-21: 18; 27: 1-28: 16); and these seven passages contain all that is really known about the life of St. Luke. Luke was probably a Syrian of Antioch, and may have been converted by St. Paul. He gives us much information about Antioch (Ac. 11: 19-30, where v. 26 is especially remarkable; 13: 1-3; 14: 26-15; 3; 15: 22-41). His opportunities of collecting the very best information were very great, owing to his residence at Antioch, at Jerusalem, at Cæsarea, and at Rome, where we lose sight of him. At all these places he would meet, or from them could easily reach, apostles and many others who had seen Jesus Christ in the flesh.

Date.—The date of the publication of the Gospel must be determined on the one hand by the date of the Acts, on the other by the many attempts at written narratives which preceded the Gospel (1: 1). We may place the third Gospel between A.D. 60 and 70. A later date is not probable on account of the early date required for the Acts.

Source.—St. Luke tells us that he obtained information from a variety of quarters, and the internal evidence shows that this is the case. The primitive tradition respecting the origin of Luke's Gospel is similar to that respecting Mark's. Mark is said to give us the teaching of St. Peter; Luke the teaching of St. Paul. But the cases are not parallel. Mark derived his 'material' from Peter; Luke derived his 'spirit' from Paul. Mark was Peter's "interpreter"; he passed on to others what Peter had said. Paul was Luke's "illuminator"; he inspired the evangelist with his own mind and spirit. Both Paul and Luke teach with special fulness the universality and freedom of salvation without legal conditions or privilege of birth. It is in this sense that the third Gospel is the Gospel of Paul.

Object.—St. Luke wrote for the whole world, whether Jew or Gentile, but especially for Greeks, as Matthew for Jews, and Mark for Romans. His is the universal Gospel (3:38; 4: 16-30; 7: 36-50; 10: 25-37; 17: 11-19; 18: 14; 19: 1-10; 23:39-43). He is less careful to set forth Jesus as the Messiah of prophecy, than to exhibit him as the Saviour of all men and the satisfier of all human needs. He shows how the lives of Jesus and his apostles are part of the history of the great Roman empire, and he is not content until he has traced the lineage of the Saviour past David and Abraham to the father of the whole human race. The Theophilus to whom he dedicates both the Gospel and the Acts was probably a real person in good social position, and either a convert or at least a catechumen, one under Christian teaching. But whether real or imaginary, he represents the intelligent and godly reader who needs information as to the historical basis of the faith. Such there will always be, and for them the third Gospel will always be of peculiar worth.

Characteristics.—No other Gospel is so complete as Luke's. It begins with the promise of the forerunner, and ends with the ascending Saviour's blessing and his disciples' continual joy. It gives us the fullest account of Christ's humanity, its development and reality, from the manger to the ascension. And Luke's keen sense of historical accuracy does not exclude a love of poetry, especially that poetry which is the outcome, not of imagination, but of religious fervor and truth. The biblical hymns, which for centuries have been used in public and private worship throughout Christendom, have all been preserved to us by St. Luke (1: 28, 46-55, 68-79; 2: 14, 28-32).

Summary.—The following main divisions can be traced in it: The preface (1: 1-4); the infancy and childhood of the forerunner and of the Saviour (1: 5-2: 52); the preparation and early ministry (3: 1-7: 50); the later ministry (8: 1-9: 50); the journeyings towards Jerusalem (9: 51-19: 48); the last days, passion, resurrection, and ascension (20: 1-24: 53).

Mahalaleel (mā-hā'la-lē-el) [praise of God], Gen. 5:12.
Mahalath (mā'ha-lath) [song, zither], occurs in the title of two psalms, Ps. 53; 88. Gesenius and others consider it to be the name of a musical instrument like the zither, to accompany the psalm. Delitzsch regards it as signifying that the psalm was to be sung mournfully like an elegy. The word signifies properly 'sickness,' so that it might be the first word of some mournful song concerning the spiritual sickness of Israel or Judea (cf. Jer. 8:21, 22). The word is followed by "Leannoth" in Ps. 88 (title), 'for singing,' probably antiphonally (the word being connected with that for 'answer').

Malachi, Book of.
Authorship and Date.—Nothing is known regarding the history or person of the prophet Malachi; nor is the name found elsewhere. The prophecy belongs to the time after the exile, when Judah was a Persian province, when the temple (1:10; 3:1) was rebuilt; and it may be assigned to some period between the first and second sojourns of Nehemiah in Jerusalem (cf. the phrase "thy governor," in 1:8; also Hag. 1:1; Neh. 5:14; 12:26).
Style and Contents.—The style of the book is more prosaic than that of the other prophets of the Old Testament. It is partly arranged as a dialogue, and attacks (1) the degenerate condition of the priesthood (1-2:9), (2) intermarriage with foreign women (2:10-16), and (3) the remissness on the part of the people in the payment of sacred dues (3:17-4:6). There are, with these, striking promises for the future. The book is important, as it contains a striking Messianic prediction (cf. 3:1; 4:1, 2).

mandrakes are mentioned in Gen. 30: 14, 15, 16, and in S. of S. 7: 13. The mandrake, 'Atropa mandragora,' is closely allied to the well-known deadly nightshade, 'A. belladona,' and to the tomato, and belongs to the order 'Solanaceæ,' or potato family. It grows in Palestine and Mesopotamia. It grows low, like lettuce, which its leaves somewhat resemble, except that they are of a dark green. The flowers are whitish-green, shading to purple, and the root is usually forked. Its fruit when ripe (early in May) is about the size of a small apple, 2½ inches in diameter, ruddy or yellow, and of a most agreeable odor (to Orientals more than to Europeans) and an equally agreeable taste. The Arabs call it manna (Heb. 'man'). The product supplied in the desert of Arabia, described as "a small round thing [flake], as small as the hoar frost on the ground." It was seen on the dew's disappearing, and when left on the ground melted when the sun waxed hot. It was like coriander seed, white, and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey. It seems impossible to say what this nutri-manuscripts of the Bible.

The autograph manuscripts, both of the Old Testament and of the New Testament, have, of course, long since perished, and those extant are copies of preceding copies. The MSS. of the Old Testament do not date as far back as those of the New Testament. Only a few date beyond the twelfth century of our era, while a few New Testament MSS. are as old as the fifth and fourth centuries, and a considerable number anterior to the tenth. The oldest known Hebrew MS. is the "MS. of the Prophets," discovered in the Crimea, now in the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg, dated 916 A.D. The oldest MS. of the entire Old Testament is dated 1010 A.D. The MSS. of the New Testament are more numerous and of higher antiquity. There are more than seventeen hundred of them. Mention can here be made of only the four or five best. They are known by the letters of the alphabet.

Aleph or the Sinaitic Codex, discovered by Tischendorf at Mt. Sinai in 1859. It is in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. It was printed at Leipsic at the expense of the Czar, several copies of which were sent to America. It contains all of the New Testament, parts of the Septuagint, and the Epistle of Barnabas. It is from the middle of the fourth century.

A, the Alexandrian Codex, now in the British Museum, comes down from the fifth century. It contains almost the whole New Testament, a part of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and one of the apocryphal epistles.

B, the Vatican Codex, from the middle of the fourth century, is in the Vatican Library in Rome. It contains the whole Bible, with the exception of parts of Genesis and some of the Psalms and the Pastoral Epistles, Philemon, Revelation, and part of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It is less complete than the Sinaitic, but more accurately written. This and the Sinaitic are the best, the most complete, and the oldest MSS. extant.

C, the Ephraem Codex, a 'palimpsest' (another work having been written over the first on the same vellum), from the fifth century, contains about two-thirds of the New Testament. It is in the National Library in Paris.

D, the Codex Bezæ, of the sixth century, once belonged to the eminent reformer Beza. It is in the University of Cambridge, England, and contains only the Gospels and Acts in Greek and Latin and a few verses of the Third Epistle of John in Latin.

MSS. are divided into two classes—'uncials' written in capital letters, and 'cursives' those written in a running hand. Those here named are all uncials, the oldest and best; but there are a number more which are quite fragmentary. The cursives are much more numerous, and although later than the uncials, some of them are of great value.

Mark, Gospel of.
Author.—The evangelist's full name was John Mark (Ac. 12: 12, 25; 15: 37), a combination of Hebrew (John, or Johanan =Jehovah is gracious) with Roman (Marcus=Hammer or Mallet), which symbolizes his mission. As in the case of Peter and Paul, the original Hebrew name (Ac. 13: 5, 13) seems to have gone out of use (Ac. 15: 39; Col. 4: 10; Phile. 24; II. Tim. 4: 11). His mother, Mary, was a friend of Peter (Ac. 12: 12), and Peter probably converted Mark, and hence calls him his son (I. Pet. 5: 13). The young man mentioned in Mar. 14: 15, 52 is possibly the evangelist. Mark was cousin to Barnabas (Col. 4: 10), and perhaps in this way came in contact with St. Paul (Ac. 12: 25; 13: 5), who dismissed him for slackness (Ac. 15: 38, 39), on which his cousin was less severe. But nine or ten years later we find him a welcome companion of St. Paul during his first Roman captivity (Col. 4: 11; Phile. 24), and a much desired fellow-worker during his second (II. Tim. 4: 11). Mark was with Peter in "Babylon," i. e., Rome, when he wrote his first epistle (I. Pet. 5: 13). The date and manner of his death are unknown.
Date.—From all the evidence, we conclude that Mark was preparing to write during Peter's lifetime, but did not complete and publish his Gospel until some time after Peter's martyrdom. The prophecies in ch. 13 lead to the conclusion that it was finished before the destruction of Jerusalem. This would place the Gospel between 67 and 70. The last twelve verses are probably not by St. Mark, whose Gospel was found incomplete (probably through some accident), and finished in different ways by later hands. Different conclusions are found in the MSS.
Sources.—Mark's Gospel contains little else than the primitive material, oral and written, which is employed by all three synoptists: and there are only about twenty-four verses in it which are not contained in Matthew or in Luke, or in both (e. g., 4: 26-29; 7: 4, 31-37; 12: 32, 33). This, however, does not extend to the history of the passion. There it would seem St. Mark has made use of St. Matthew's account, and vice versa. There is good reason for believing that the source of most of this common material is the preaching of St. Peter. That which is found in all three Gospels, or in Mark and Matthew, or in Mark and Luke, is just that part of Christ's life of which Peter would have personal knowledge. The earliest witnesses, from Papias (A.D. 130) downwards, state that Mark recorded the things which were related by Peter.
Object.—It is probably true that St. Mark wrote his Gospel in Rome for Gentiles, and primarily for Romans. It is confirmed by the internal evidence of the Gospel itself. In his own person he quotes only two passages from the Old Testament (1: 2, 3). He makes no reference to the Mosaic Law, and gives no genealogy of the Messiah. He explains Jewish words, localities, and customs (3: 17; 5: 41; 7: 3, 11; 10: 46; 12: 18, 42; 13: 3; 14: 1, 12, 36; 15: 6, 16, 34, 42). The Latin words which he uses may be the result of life in Rome (6: 27; 7: 4; 12: 42; 15: 39, 44, 45).
Characteristics and Summary.—He represents Christ as the Son of God, exhibiting the divine power in mighty wonders, especially in vanquishing the powers of evil by healing demoniacs. The people are thus led to recognize in him a spiritual conqueror, an aspect of the Crucified which would be acceptable to heathen, and especially to the Romans. The Gospel of St. Mark has no special characteristics as regards doctrine. It is primitive and neutral; practical rather than theological. In style it is inartificial, clear, and vivid; originality and truthfulness are stamped on its face. The writer has little literary skill. His language is homely and sometimes ungrammatical. But he has a faithful memory, and can reproduce with picturesque freshness the graphic narratives which he had heard again and again from St. Peter; hence his fondness for the historic present, for the scene is before him as he writes; and his frequent "straightway" is perhaps a trait caught from the eager lips of the impetuous apostle. He notices more than any other evangelist the human emotions and the gestures of Christ, and it is from him that we learn that Jesus as well as Joseph was a carpenter (6: 3). The arrangement, so far as there is any, is simple: The introduction (1: 1-8); the ministry in Galilee, Peræa, and Jerusalem (1: 9-13: 37); the passion and resurrection (14: 1-16: 8).

Matthew, Gospel of.
Author.—Matthew may safely be identified with Levi. The call of Levi (Mark 2:14; Lu. 5:27) is evidently the same as the call of Matthew (Mat. 9:9)
Date.—The Gospel was probably written in Palestine, A.D. 60-70. It was before the destruction of Jerusalem (ch. 24).
Object.—That Matthew wrote for Jewish Christians is affirmed by all ancient writers from Irenæus (A.D. 180) downwards; and the statement is abundantly confirmed by the internal evidence of the Gospel itself.
Style and Summary.—St. Matthew gives us more fully than either St. Mark or St. Luke the discourses of Jesus Christ (chs. 5, 6, 7, 10, 13, 18, 23, 24, 25). In the Gospel, as we have it, the narrative forms about one-fourth of the whole. St. Matthew does not tie himself to the chronological order of events, but often groups his sections according to similarity of matter. He probably had very little plan in writing, but we can mark the following divisions: The birth and infancy of the King (chs. 1, 2); the preparation for the kingdom (3:1-4:16); the works of the kingdom and its true nature (4:17-16:20); the journey to Jerusalem and residence there (16:21; 20:17); the passion and resurrection (chs. 26-28).

Measures of Capacity and Length.

1 Log	½ pint.
1 Cab = 4 logs	3½ pints.
1 Hin = 3 cabs	1½ gallons.
1 Omer = 1 cabs	6 pints.
1 Seah = 3½ omers	2⅔ gallons.
1 Ephah or bath = 3 seahs	8 gallons.
1 Lethech = 5 ephahs	40 gallons.
1 Homer = 10 ephahs	80 gallons.

Respecting measures of length, we have no sufficient data to enable us to do more than present the following approximations:

1 Digit	⅔ inch.
1 Palm = 4 digits	3 inches.
1 Span = 3 palms	9 inches.
1 Cubit = 2 spans	1½ feet.
1 Reed = 6 cubits	9 feet.

In the Greek and Roman periods the following measures of distance prevailed in common use:

A Roman foot	11.65 inches.
A Greek foot	1 foot 0.135 inch.
A Roman passus	4 feet 10½ inches.
A Greek fathom	6 feet 1 inch.
A Greek furlong	202 yards.
A Roman mile	0.92 English mile, or about 1,615 yards.
A Persian parasang	3½ miles (nearly).

Messiah (mĕs-sī'ah) [anointed]. This word (Mashiach) answers to the word Christ (or Christos) in the New Testament, and is applicable in its first sense to any one anointed with the holy oil. The kings of Israel were called 'anointed,' from the mode of their consecration, I. Sa. 2:10, 35; 12:3, 5, etc. This word also refers to the expected Prince of the chosen people who was to complete God's purposes for them and to redeem them, and of whose coming the prophets of the old covenant in all time spoke. He was the Messiah, the 'Anointed,' i. e. consecrated as the king and prophet by God's appointment. The word is twice used in the New Testament of Jesus, John 1:41; 4:25; A.V. "Messias."

Micah, Book of.
Author.—The prophet is described in chapter 1:1 as a native of Moresheth, a little town in the maritime plain, a dependency of Gath. He prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. He was a younger contemporary of Isaiah, and may perhaps be described as "the prophet of the people."

Contents.—The book may be divided into three sections: (1) Chs. 1 and 2, the judgment that will come upon Israel and Judah for their sins, together with a promise that the remnant of Israel shall be delivered. (2) Chs. 3-5, a vivid description of the sinfulness of the leaders of the people, the destruction of Jerusalem, the future restoration of the people, and the glorious reign of the Messianic king. (3) Chs. 6 and 7, exhortations to repentance and threats of punishment, the penitent attitude of the people toward Jehovah, with promises of future restoration. The Messianic prophecy in ch. 5:2, 3 is of great importance; the allusions also in chs. 6 and 7 to the Pentateuch are of considerable value.

Moabite Stone, The. In the year 1868 Rev. F. A. Klein, of the Church Missionary Society at Jerusalem, found at Dhiban (the biblical Dibon), in Moab, a remarkable stone, since called the Moabite Stone. It was lying on the ground, with the inscription uppermost, and measures about 3 feet 9 inches long, 2 feet 4 inches wide and 1 foot 2 inches thick. It is a very heavy, compact, black basalt. An impression was made of the main block, and of certain recovered parts broken off by the Arabs. It was broken by the Arabs, but the fragments were purchased by the French government for 32,000 francs, and are in the Louvre in Paris. The engraved face is about the shape of an ordinary gravestone rounded at the top. On this stone is the record in the Phœnician characters of the wars of Mesha, king of Moab, with Israel, II. Ki. 3:4. It speaks of King Omri and other names of places and persons mentioned in the Bible, and belongs to this exact period of Jewish and Moabite history. The names given on the Moabite Stone, engraved by one who knew them in daily money.

1. Uncoined money.—It is well known that ancient nations that were without a coinage weighed the precious metals, a practice represented on the Egyptian monuments, on which gold and silver are shown to have been kept in the form of rings. We have no evidence of the use of 'coined money' before the return from the Babylonian captivity; but silver was used for money, in quantities determined by weight, at least as early as the time of Abraham; and its earliest mention is in the generic sense of the price paid for a slave, Gen. 17:13. The 1000 'pieces of silver' paid by Abimelech to Abraham, Gen. 20:16, and the 20 'pieces of silver' for which Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites, Gen. 37:28, were probably rings such as we see on the Egyptian monuments in the act of being weighed. The shekel weight of silver was the unit of value through the whole age of Hebrew history, down to the Babylonian captivity.

2. Coined money.—After the captivity we have the earliest mention of coined money, in allusion, as might have been expected, to the Persian coinage, the gold 'daric' (A.V. 'dram'), Ezra 2:69; 8:27; Neh. 7:70, 71, 72. No native Jewish coinage appears to have existed till Antiochus VII. The abundant money of Herod the Great, which is of a thoroughly Greek character and of copper only, seems to have been a continuation of the copper coinage of the Maccabees, with some adaptation to the Roman standard. The coins mentioned by the evangelists, and first those of silver, are the following: The

and is of about the same value as the Jewish 'stater,' or coined shekel. The 'denarius,' or Roman penny, as well as the Greek 'drachma,' then of about the same weight, are spoken of as current coins, Mat. 22:15-21; Lu. 20:19-25. They were worth about 15 cents. Of copper coins the 'farthing' and its half, the 'mite,' are spoken of and these probably formed the chief native currency. The Roman farthing ('quadrans') was a brass coin worth .375 of a cent. The Greek 'farthing' ('as' or 'assarion') was worth four Roman farthings, i. e. about one cent and a half. A 'mite' was half a farthing, and therefore was worth about two-tenths of a cent if the half of the Roman farthing, and about two cents if the half of the Greek farthing.

Months of the Hebrew Year.

The Months.—The year consisted of twelve lunar months, and the month contained from twenty-nine to thirty days. The Jewish, like the Babylonian, month began with the evening when the new moon was first observed, and the entire length of the year of twelve months was three hundred and fifty-four days. This discrepancy between the lunar and the solar year made intercalary months necessary, both in the Babylonian and Jewish systems. Thus we have an intercalary (or second) Adar, called "Ve-adar."

The Day and the Night.—The "civil" day of twenty-four hours was reckoned from sunset to sunset. This is clear from the express injunction in Lev. 23:32 to reckon the Sabbath from evening to evening. The reference in Gen. 1:5 is far from clear, and therefore should not be quoted in this connection.

musical instruments of the Hebrews.
I. Stringed Instruments.—(1) The 'harp' or lyre. (2) The 'psaltery,' the name of various large instruments of the harp kind. (3) The 'sackbut,' a harp-like instrument of four strings and of triangular form. (4) A kind of lute or guitar ('mahalath'), in titles to Ps. 53 and 88, with a long, flat neck, and a hollow body of wood whose surface was perforated with holes. There were three strings, and the whole instrument was three or four feet long. (5) The 'gittith,' in titles to Ps. 8, 81, 84, a stringed instrument, probably found by David at Gath, whence its name.

II. Instruments of Percussion. (1) The 'timbrel', a form of tambourine, a narrow hoop covered with a tightened skin, and struck with the hand. On the Egyptian monuments are three kinds—the circular, the square, and another formed by two squares separated by a bar. (2) The drum ('toph'). Of this there were many varieties, some of them resembling modern drums. The Egyptians had a long drum, of wood or copper, 2½ feet long, resembling the tom-tom of India, and beaten by the hand. Another form was shaped like a cask with bulging centre, and was made of copper. It was of the same length as the other, but larger around, and was beaten with sticks. Another drum was more like our kettledrum; and one of these, the rabbins say, was placed in the temple court to call the priests to prayer, and could be heard from Jerusalem to Jericho. (3) Bells ('paamon'), attached to the high priest's dress, and rung by striking against the knobs, shaped like pomegranates, which were hung near them. (4) Cymbals. The earliest cymbals were probably finger-cymbals—small plates of metal fastened to the thumb and middle finger, and struck together. Afterward there were the large cymbals, played with both hands. (5) Systra ('menaanim'), II. Sa. 6:5, there translated cornets. The systrum was a carved bronze or copper frame, with a handle, in all from 8 to 16 inches long, with movable rings and bars. It was shaken with the hand, and the rings and bars made a piercing metallic sound by striking against the bronze frame. (6) The triangle ('shalishim'), I Sa. 18:6, a musical instrument ('machol') used for accompanying the dance, and several times translated dancing, Ps. 150:3, 4, 5. It was a metallic rim or frame, sometimes with a handle, and had small bells attached to it, or bars across on which were strung metallic rings or plates. It was held in the hand, and was played by the women at weddings and merry-makings.

III. Wind Instruments.—(1) The syrinx, pandean pipe or bagpipe ('ugab'); translated "organ" in Gen. 4:21. Either like the bagpipe, or a series of pipes from 5 to 23 in number, though usually only 7. (2) The horn, in the form of an animal's horn even when made of metal, but originating in the use of the horns of cattle. (3) The trumpet ('shophar'), same as horn 2. (4) The straight trumpet. (5) The flute ('halil,' meaning "bored through"), a pipe perforated with holes, originally made from reeds, but afterward of wood, bone, horn or ivory. It was chiefly consecrated to joy or pleasure. (6) The flute, alluded to in Dan. 3:5; probably a kind of double flageolet. (7) The dulcimer, Dan. 3:5, a kind of bagpipe with two shrill reeds. The modern dulcimer is a triangular instrument strung with about fifty brass wires, and played upon with little sticks or metallic rods. It more resembles Nahum (nā'hum) [comforting], a prophet of Judah.

Nahum, Book of.
Author and Date.—All we know of Nahum is that he lived at Elkosh, a village which was, according to Jerome, in Galilee. The book may have been composed some time between the fall of Thebes in Egypt (alluded to in ch. 3: 8-10, Noamon), c. 644 B.C., and the destruction of Nineveh by the Medes and Babylonians in 607 B.C.
Subject.—The subject of Nahum's prophecy is the fall of Nineveh. The descriptions are very striking and picturesque. The style is terse and vigorous, and resembles more closely that of Isaiah than that of any of the other prophets. The prophet presents (1) the majesty of God and the certainty of his judgments against the wicked city (ch. 1); (2) a vivid picture of the fall of the city (ch. 2); and (3) the complete destruction of Nineveh and its desolation (ch. 3),—all given with marvelous detail and brilliancy. These prophecies had a most striking fulfilment in the disappearance for ages of the very site, until recent explorations revealed the extent of the ancient city.

nettles. Two Hebrew words are thus translated. 'Kimmosh' is believed to be the common stinging nettle, of which there are several species in Palestine belonging to the genus 'Urtica.' It is mentioned in Isa. 34:13; Hos. 9:6; Prov. 24:31, where it is translated "thorns." The second word,' charul,' translated "nettles" in Prov. 24:31, is in the margin of R.V. "wild vetches." Tristram thinks it was the thorny acanthus (Acanthus spinosus).

New Moon, festival of. We have no information as to its inauguration among the local sanctuaries in the earlier period of Israel's national history. The practice in the post-exilian days, and perhaps in the reformed custom of the seventh century, seems to have followed the rule laid down in Nu. 10:10 that on the first day of the month the blowing of the trumpets should accompany the celebration of burnt-offerings and peace-offerings.

Numbers. The fourth book of the law or Pentateuch. It takes its name in the LXX. and Vulgate (whence our "Numbers") from the double numbering or census of the people; the first of which is given in chs. 1-4, and the second in ch. 26. The book may be said to contain generally the history of the Israelites from the time of their leaving Sinai, in the second year after the exodus, till their arrival at the borders of the promised land, in the fortieth year of their journeyings. It consists of the following principal divisions: (1) The preparations for the departure from Sinai, Num. 1: 1-10: 10. (2) The journey from Sinai to the borders of Canaan, ch. 10: 11-14: 45. (3) A brief notice of laws given and events which transpired during the thirty-seven years' wandering in the wilderness, ch. 15: 1-19: 22. (4) The history of the last year, from the second arrival of the Israelites in Kadesh till they reached "the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho," ch. 20: 1-36: 13.

nuts. In Gen. 43: 11 the word seems to refer to the pistachio nut 'Pistacia vera.' Nuts, which are still in large demand in the East, were sent as a present to Joseph. In S. of S. 6: 11 the reference is to the walnut.
Nymphas (nĭm'fas) [nymph], Col. 4: 15.

O

oak. Of the six Hebrew names thus translated, one ('elah') refers to the terebinth or teil tree (see Elm and Teil). The other names seem to refer to various species of oaks, such as the evergreen oak. At least three species of oak are to be found in Palestine, and in the early days of the Israelites oak forests must have been very extensive.

Obadiah, Book of. The fourth of the twelve minor prophets. We know nothing of him except what we can gather from the short book which bears his name. The question of his date must depend upon the interpretation of the 11th verse of his prophecy. He there speaks of the conquest of Jerusalem and the captivity of Jacob as having occurred. He probably refers to the captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 588. It must have been uttered at some time in the five years which intervened between B.C. 588 and 563. The book of Obadiah is a sustained denunciation of the Edomites, melting into a vision of the future glories of Zion when the arm of the Lord should have wrought her deliverance and have repaid double upon her enemies.

Jewish Division of Books.—The arrangement of the books of the Old Testament was different among the ancient Jews from the order in our Bibles. They divided the books into three parts:
1. 'The Law,' or "torah," consisting of the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses.
2. 'The Prophets,' consisting of (1) the former prophets, Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings. (2) The latter prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the 12 minor prophets.
3. 'The Hagiographa,' or "holy writings," including the rest of the books. These were graded in three parts: (1) the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. (2) The Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. (3) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the books of Chronicles. These books were also called Kethubim, "writings."

Olive Branches and Olives.

olive, a native of southwestern Asia, but

naturalized from remote antiquity in the Holy Land. In Canaan the Israelites found vines and olive trees already in full bearing. The produce of this tree is still a great source of wealth. The young leaves, at first green, soon assume a characteristic silvery-white appearance. The oil is derived from the fruits, and does not readily dry. The tree lives to an immense age, and is fertile to the last.

oven. The eastern oven is of two kinds—fixed and portable. The former is found only in towns, where regular bakers are employed, Hos. 7: 4. The latter is adapted to the nomad state. It consists of a large jar made of clay, about three feet high and widening toward the bottom, with a hole for the extraction of the ashes. Each household possessed such an article, Ex. 8: 3; and it was only in times of extreme dearth that the same oven sufficed for several families, Lev. 26: 26. It was heated with dry twigs and grass, Matt. 6: 30, and the loaves were placed both inside and outside of it. At the present time, however, there are public ovens in many villages of Palestine.

Palestina (păl-es-tī'nà) or Palestine (păl'es-tine) (Heb., 'Pelesheth') [wandering], included in O. T. times Philistia; later, all of Canaan. See Ex. 15: 14; Isa. 14: 29.

Palestine. (Last syllable pronounced 'tyne.') This is the modern name of "the Holy Land," the land wherein most of the events of Bible history took place. The word is a corruption or modification of the word "Philistine," and is never used in the Bible with reference to the land of Israel.

The Names.—Palestine is designated in the Bible by more than one name. (1) During the patriarchal period, the conquest and the age of the judges, and also where those early periods are referred to in the later literature (as Ps. 105: 11), it is spoken of as "Canaan," or more frequently "the land of Canaan," meaning thereby the country west of the Jordan, as opposed to "the land of Gilead," on the east. (2) During the monarchy the name usually, though not frequently, employed is "land of Israel," I. Sa. 13: 19. (3) Between the captivity and the time of our Lord the name "Judea" had extended itself from the southern portion to the whole of the country, and even that beyond the Jordan, Mat. 19: 1; Mar. 10: 1. (4) The Roman division of the country hardly coincided with the Biblical one, and it does not appear that the Romans had any distinct name for that which we understand by Palestine. (5) Soon after the Christian era we find the name Palestina in possession of the country. (6) The name most frequently used throughout the middle ages, and down to our own time, is 'Terra Sancta'—the Holy Land.

The Land.—The holy land is not in size or physical characteristics proportioned to its moral and historical position as the theatre of the most momentous events in the world's history. Its principal section west of the Jordan is but a strip of country about the size of Wales, or Massachusetts, less than 140 miles in length and barely 40 in average breadth, on the very frontier of the East, hemmed in between the Mediterranean Sea on the one hand and the enormous trench of the Jordan valley on the other, by which it is effectually cut off from the mainland of Asia behind it. On the north it is shut in by the high ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and by the chasm of the Litany. On the south it is no less enclosed by the arid and inhospitable deserts of the upper part of the peninsula of Sinai.

Physical Features.—Palestine is essentially a mountainous country. The mass of hills which occupies the centre of the country is bordered or framed on both sides, east and west, by a broad belt of lowland, sunk deep below its own level. On the west this lowland interposes between the mountains and the sea, and is the plain of Philistia and of Sharon. On the east it is the broad bottom of the Jordan valley, deep down in which rushes the one river of Palestine to its grave in the Dead Sea. East of the Jordan is a second line of mountains, steep on their western sides, but on their eastern sloping away to the great Arabian desert. Thus the country lies in four sections: (1) The mountain plain; (2) the mountain region; (3) the Jordan valley; (4) the eastern tableland.

Mountains.—Among the mountains of the north are (1) the Lebanon, Josh. 13: 6; I. Ki. 5: 6; Ps. 29: 5; Isa. 14: 8; Ezra 3: 7, a very narrow, rugged range of hard limestone, well watered, and with good soil near its feet. "Lebanon towards the sunrising," Josh. 13: 5, is the Anti-Libanus—an arid and desert chain, ending in white peaks of chalk on the north, near Palmyra. (2) Mt. Hermon, dome-shaped and rugged. To the west stretches Mt. Carmel. Along the west of the Jordan River are Tabor, Gilboa, and Ebal and Gerizim, "mountains of blessing and cursing." About Jerusalem are Olivet, Moriah, and Zion. In the southern limit rises Horeb, or Sinai.

Rivers.—In the extreme north is the broad, rapid Orontes, the Eleutherus; and further northeast, the Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus. The Leontes forms the natural division of Syria and Palestine. In the centre, flowing to the sea, is the Kishon. From north to south runs the Jordan, rising in Mount Hermon, and flowing into the Dead Sea. (See Jordan River.) East of the Jordan are the Jabbok, the Arnon, which forms the north border of Moab, and the Brook Zered, the north boundary of Edom. The River of Egypt, 'Nakhal,' is the great torrent which bounds the Holy Land on the south. There are several minor streams watering Palestine, both those which flow west into the sea, and those which join the Jordan. The perennial streams of Syria are more numerous than those of Palestine, and in Judea there are no streams that run all the year, as there are in Galilee.

Lakes.—The principal lakes in Palestine are the Sea of Galilee (of Gennesaret, or of Tiberias) and the Dead Sea. The former is a pear-shaped basin, 12 miles north and south by 8 miles east and west at its broadest, and which has a depth of 160 feet. The waters of the lake are sweet, but somewhat turbid near the Jordan. The basin is subject to sudden storms, such as are mentioned in the N. T. (Mat. 8:24; 14:24; Mar. 4:37; Lu. 8:23.)

The Dead Sea extends 40 miles in length by 10 in breadth, and its level is kept down entirely by evaporation, which makes a difference of 15 feet in the winter and summer water-marks. The saltness is greater than that of any other known body of water, 25 per cent. of various chlorides having been found in the analysis of specimens. No fish can live in the waters, which are extremely buoyant. The greatest depth near the east shore is about 1,300 feet.

Seacoast.—The Palestine coast has only one natural harbor—the open roadstead under Carmel, at the south end of the Bay of Accho. The small ports of Gaza, Jabneel, Joppa, and Cæsarea are formed by dangerous reefs. Tyre possessed two ports, still extant, but both small, and formed by reefs. Sidon had a larger port of the same character. This disadvantage may account for the small maritime power of the Hebrews, as compared with the Phœnicians, and Greeks.

Plains.—Lower Galilee includes the large plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon (14 miles by 10 miles), of triangular shape. The seaside plains of Sharon and Philistia are remarkable for the fertility of the soil; on the north of the former there was an open woodland of oaks, which still exist, though much injured. The plains of Bashan are also remarkable for the same rich volcanic soil, suitable for corn-land. The plain of valley of Jericho and Shittim is less naturally fertile, owing to the saltness of the soil, and is only tilled towards the north, while on the south it is scattered with acacias, and near the Dead Sea grows only the alkali plant. Wheat is still grown in the upper part of the Jordan valley, where a few stunted palms represent the remains of former palm gardens (Josephus, Antiq., xviii., 11, 2). The plateau of Beersheba is entirely pastoral, and still sustains large flocks, watered at deep wells. The arable plains cease on the south near Gaza.

Palestine—Continued

Early Inhabitants.—During the patriarchal period Palestine was occupied by Semitic and other tribes, the former speaking dialects more or less akin to Hebrew and Phœnician, the "language of Canaan," i. e., of the lowlands. Whether the 'Giants' mentioned from time to time were relics of this ancient race, we have no means of determining, nor do we know what their exact character may have been. To these "giants" belonged the 'Rephaim,' probably the oldest people in Palestine, called by the Edomites Emim, and by the Ammonites Zamzummim. The people of this race, known to the Hebrews as Zuzim or Zamzummim, dwelt between Bashan and Moab, the Anakim in and around Hebron, the Emim on the plain of Kiriath west of the Dead Sea, the Avim in the neighborhood of Gaza, the Horites, or "cave-dwellers," in the mountainous regions of Seir (Gen. 14:5, 6; Deu. 2:11, 12, 20-23). The Anakim were driven out by Joshua (or, rather, Caleb), and the Horites, whose dwellings still exist, were exterminated by the Edomites (Deu. 2:12, 22). The Amorites ("Highlanders") dwelt in the southwest of Palestine, their capitals being Hebron and Hazezon-Tamar. They possessed part of the country afterwards occupied by the tribe of Judah. The Amorites were the most powerful of the eleven tribes into which the Canaanites were divided. The Hivites (see Gen. 10:17) dwelt first in mid-Canaan, in Schechem (Gen. 34:2), in Gibeon (Josh. 9:3-7; 11:19), and later in the northern parts of Lebanon and even as far as Hamath (Josh. 11:3; Judg. 3:3; II. Sa. 24:7). The Jebusites, though a small tribe, was one of importance, for they occupied the mountains of Jerusalem and the neighborhood. The Girgashites west of the Jordan, the Arkites of Lebanon, who built the city of Arka, the Sinites in the same neighborhood, the Arvadites and the Zemarites of Aradus and Simyra, and the Hamathites on the Orontes, were all descendants of Canaan, and therefore non-Semitic. More important than these, however, were the Amalekites, an ancient people ("the first of the nations," Nu. 24:20) of Edomite descent, who, according to Kautzsch, occupied the southern portion of Canaan and a large part of the peninsula of Sinai. The Kenites were a branch of the Midianites (cf. Judg. 4:11 with Nu. 10:29), and dwelt among the Amalekites (Nu. 24:20, 21; I. Sa. 15:6). A portion of them followed the Israelites on their entrance into Canaan (Judg. 1:16; 4:11). The Kenizzites ("hunters"), who lived to the south of Palestine, as descendants of "duke Kenaz" (Gen. 36:15, 42), were among the descendants of Esau. In the southwest corner of Palestine lived the Philistines, who are said to have come from Caphtor (Am. 9:7; Jer. 47:4; Deu. 2:23; Gen. 10:13, 14—in this last the names seem to be transposed), and are apparently described as the descendants of Mizraim. Caphtor has been identified with Cyprus and Crete.

—a tree, at one time characteristic of Palestine. Peculiar in the erect mode of its growth, with its branchless, tapering stem and great summit cluster of leaves, it stood out from all other trees of the country. In some districts it was found in dense groves; in others, isolated trees served as landmarks. Its stem and leaves were favorite subjects for architectural embellishments from the period of Solomon's temple. The immense branchlike leaves are mentioned as symbols of triumph, and were used on occasions of rejoicing.

paradise. This word is of Persian origin, and was applied to the garden or park connected with the royal residence. Owing to the Persians regarding their kings as gods the residence of the king and its surrounding grounds were looked upon as a divine abode. Accordingly paradise came to mean the precincts of the divine dwelling-place.

Passover, Feast of the. The Passover was the covenant feast of Israel, kept on the 14th Abib, or Nisan, followed by the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which lasted seven days (Lev. 23: 6). It was strictly ordained that all leaven should be removed from the dwellings of the Hebrews on the 14th Nisan. This was the preparation for the Passover (John 19: 14). The presence of women, boys, and little children, as well as men, was permitted at this as well as other festivals (Lu. 2: 41; cf. I. Sa. 1: 24), for the festival, though national, was domestic. The victim might be either a lamb or a kid (Ex. 12: 5), and it was to be selected four days beforehand, i. e., 10th Nisan, by the head of the family. If a household was too small, it might unite with another small household in providing a single lamb for both. The lamb was slain at sunset of the 14th Nisan, and whatever remained uneaten was consumed by fire. The paschal feast was eaten by the family with unleavened cakes and bitter herbs, with loins girded, sandals on the feet, and staff in hand. The animal was eaten entire—head, legs, and entrails—without breaking a bone (Ex. 12: 7-11), so far as this was possible. The Jews still observe the Passover, but omit from the service the eating of the roasted lamb.

Pastoral Epistles. A title given to three of St. Paul's epistles, First and Second Timothy, and Titus. It expresses the chief characteristic of this last group of the Pauline Epistles; but it might easily mislead, for the letters, especially II. Timothy, are by no means wholly pastoral. They are placed out of the chronological order, between the other epistles of St. Paul and that to Philemon. Like Philemon, they are personal; like the others, they treat of church practice, doctrine, and government, rather than of personal topics. Yet these church questions are treated, not (as in other epistles) from the point of view of the congregation, but from that of the minister. The dates can only be approximately fixed. Titus and I. Timothy were written after St. Paul's release from the first Roman imprisonment, and II. Timothy was written during the second Roman imprisonment, shortly before the apostle's martyrdom in A. D. 67 or 68. Titus may have been written before I. Timothy, but it is impossible to find a place for the whole group—so evidently connected with one another, and so distinct from the preceding group—inside the period covered by the Acts.

Pentateuch, The.
Name.—The name 'Pentateuch' comes from the Greek, and means the 'five-volumed' (book). Its Hebrew designation is "the Law," or "the book of the law of Moses," or, by the later Jews, "the five-fifth parts of the law."
Author.—Jewish tradition ascribed the entire work to Moses, sometimes even asserting that the last verses of Deuteronomy were the production of that lawgiver. The modern view is that these books first appeared somewhat in their present form in the eighth century B. C., but that parts of them were in existence earlier.
The name Jehovah, or 'Jahveh,' is employed in certain portions of Genesis, and the name 'Elohim' (God) in others, whence the titles 'Elohistic' and 'Jehovistic,' or 'Jahvistic.' This variation in the use of the divine names only extends as far as Ex. 6, but other indications of the use of earlier documents extend through the whole work.
Pentecost, Feast of. Called also "the feast of weeks." Pentecost is a Greek word meaning the fiftieth day. This followed the last day of the seven weeks reckoned from "the morrow of the Sabbath" (Lev. 23: 11, 15, 16). The Feast of Weeks thus fell on the 6th Sivan. It is believed to commemorate the giving of the law at Mount Sinai. Pentecost corresponds to the Whitsuntide of the modern church, in commemoration of the great day of Pentecost when the Holy Spirit was bestowed upon the church, Ac. 2.
—how observed, Lev. 23: 9; Deu. 16: 9.

Peter, First Epistle of.

Author, Date, and Place.—Excepting the four great epistles of St. Paul, there is no book in the N. T. of which the authorship is better attested than the First Epistle of St Peter. The questions open to doubt are when and where he wrote it. The "fiery trial" which awaits the readers of I. Peter (4:12) seems to point to the persecution under Nero. If this is correct, we must place the epistle either in or after A.D. 64, a date which fully explains the writer's acquaintance with Romans, Ephesians, and St. James. The letter itself indicates where it was written. "She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus my son" (5:13). It is scarcely doubtful that this refers to the city of Rome. Babylon had long been a name for Rome among the Jews; and such a name would have special point during the Neronian persecution.

Motive.—The address of the letter is figurative, as Babylon is figurative. The letter is written "to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia," etc. This probably means those Christians who had fled from Nero's persecution and taken refuge in Asia Minor. The chief motive of the letter is to inspire patience and hope amid tribulation and persecution, and steadfastness under temptation.

Contents.—There are (1) an exhortation to perseverance under persecution (1: 1-2: 10); (2) admonitions to discharge of particular duties (2: 11-3: 13); (3) the enforcement, by the example of Christ, of duties of patience and holiness (3: 14-4: 19); directions for officers of the church and members, with salutations (5: 1-14).

Peter, Second Epistle of.
Authorship.—The authorship of the Second Epistle is one of the most perplexing problems in N. T. criticism. The writer of II. Peter seems to give every opportunity of identification. He is "Symeon Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ" (1: 1), whose death Christ foretold (1: 14), who was present at the transfiguration (1: 18), and was the author of I. Peter (3: 1). The difficulties of admitting the writer's claim to be the chief of the apostles are serious; but the difficulties of rejecting it are not less serious. "In style and diction it is very unlike I. Peter." If not written by Peter himself, it was by some one who wrote in his name.
Date and Address.—It was probably written shortly before the apostle's death, and therefore probably in Rome. It is addressed to all Christians (1: 1), but especially to the recipients of the First Epistle (3: 1).
Contents.—There are striking resemblances between II. Peter and I. Peter, and between II. Peter and the speeches of St. Peter as reported in the Acts. In I. Peter there are borrowings from St. Paul and from St. James; and it need not startle us if in II. Peter we find borrowings from St. Jude. The letter begins and ends in exhortations to grow in grace and knowledge (1: 3-21; 3: 14-18), the central portion being occupied with warnings and predictions regarding the certainty of the punishment of the impenitent, and of the future judgment (2: 1-3: 13), which are the main object of the epistle.

Pharisee.—The word Pharisee is derived from the Hebrew word meaning "to separate," and this title was given to the Pharisees because of their superior strictness in adhering to the law. They held themselves apart from all Gentile contact, observed the most minute injunctions of the oral law, professed faith in washings and vows, and were intolerant of those who differed from them. They formed a large class, including many of the scribes. They were not identical with the scribes, but were rather a class among the scribes. So exact were they in their ceremonial requirements that the ordinary Jew was to the Pharisee an unclean being, no better than a heathen. They were sanctimonious in manner, and hypocritical in character, transforming religion into the mere outward observance of acts and ceremonies.
In doctrine they held to freedom of the will and also predestination, the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body and the existence of angels and spirits.
They were spiritually proud, and in great part without moral excellence. Their estimate of the common people is very well indicated in our Lord's parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. Yet there were notable exceptions. Some of the best names in Jewish literature are those of Pharisees, and they really had within their number much that was best and bravest in Israel. They contended for liberty of conscience in worshipping God and so thoroughly devoted were they to the observance of the law that they would submit to butchery by their enemies rather than violate any of its precepts. The distinction between the Pharisees and the Sadducees was not so much religious as political. The Pharisees were really the party of the people, while the Sadducees were the party of the aristocracy. In number the Pharisees did not exceed about six thousand.

Philemon, The Epistle to.

Character.—This is a private letter from an apostle to a private individual. The pastoral epistles are addressed to individuals, but they are not private. They are partly official, being written to persons who hold office in the church, and are to be read by others besides Titus and Timothy. The letter to Philemon is entirely domestic. Short as it is, it reveals the apostle to us in a new, but not unexpected character, as the perfect Christian gentleman, with all a gentleman's courtesy and delicacy of feeling.

Date.—It was written at the same time as the epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians (A. D. 63); and Onesimus, the bearer of it, was accompanied by Tychicus, who had charge of the two longer epistles.

Occasion.—Philemon of Colossæ had been converted by St. Paul. Apphia was probably his wife, and Archippus possibly his son (v. 2). Onesimus, his slave, had robbed him and fled to Rome, the common hiding-place of countless criminals. His name means "profitable," and hence the play on words (v. 11). While he was in Rome he came in contact with St. Paul, who converted him and became deeply attached to him. But at great personal sacrifice he restored him to his master, whom he begs to welcome the former slave and thief as now a brother and the apostle's child. Neither here nor in other epistles in which he treats of slaves and their masters does St. Paul order or even recommend emancipation. But he enjoins a treatment of slaves which would render emancipation either inevitable or unnecessary. If a slave is treated as a beloved brother, slavery has become an empty form. Of the effect of this letter we have no certain knowledge; but we need not doubt that Onesimus was forgiven and kindly received.

Philippians, Epistle to.

The Philippian Church.—Philippi, founded by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, and immortalized by the battle which ended the Roman republic and ushered in the empire (B.C. 42), had been thereupon raised to the rank of a Roman military colony, and made a miniature likeness of Rome. St. Paul's first visit to Philippi, in company with Silas, Timothy, and Luke, is narrated by Luke with exceptional detail in one of the "we" sections (Ac. 16:11-40). This was on the second missionary journey, in or near A. D. 52. Nowhere, in spite of very great persecution, was the apostle's success so great, and nowhere had he more loyal converts. They were the only congregation from which he accepted pecuniary help (4:15), and that more than once. He was deeply attached to them as his "joy and crown," and visited them a second time towards the end of 57, and yet a third time on his return to Asia for the last journey to Jerusalem, in the spring of 58, when he stayed and kept Easter with them.

Occasion and Date.—The letter is a spontaneous expression of love and gratitude in return for the affectionate generosity of the Philippians, and is a beautiful reflection of the apostle's mind and character in its noblest and tenderest moods. It was sent by Epaphroditus, who had brought help from the Philippians to their imprisoned master in Rome. St. Paul sent by him this affectionate letter (2:25-30). It was probably the first of the group of letters written during the first Roman imprisonment.

Contents.—The epistle to the Philippians is the only one of St. Paul's letters to the churches in which there is no word of rebuke or disappointment. It overflows with Christian cheerfulness. "Rejoice in the Lord alway: again I will say, Rejoice" (4:4). It approaches the character of a private letter as an exhibition of personal feeling; hence there is very little arrangement of topics: Salutation and thanksgiving (1:1-11); personal narrative (1:12-26); exhortation to follow Christ (1:27-2:18); the missions of Timothy and Epaphroditus (2:19-30); final charge, interrupted by a caution against those who debase the gospel (3:1-4:1), and resumed (4:2-9); gratitude for their bounty (4:10-20); greetings and blessing (4:21-23). He looks forward to visiting them again (2:24); and it would seem that this hope was fulfilled in the interval between the two Roman imprisonments (I. Tim. 1:3); but in the New Testament we are told no more about Philippi.

proselytes, Jewish, Ac. 2: 10; 6: 5; 13: 43. Gentiles who were won to the Jewish faith from the heathen world were called proselytes. Of these there were two classes:
1. Those who adopted the Jewish religion, observed the commandments, and worshipped in "the court of the Gentiles," whether in the Temple or the synagogue; but were not formally received into the Jewish church and nation. These were called "the devout." Strictly speaking, the term, "proselyte" did not apply to such. From this class came many of the early Gentile Christians.
2. Those who by circumcision were received into the Jewish fellowship, and undertook to fulfil all the requirements of the law. They were called, "proselytes of righteousness."

[1] According to many authorities, Joel was the first prophet whose message was committed to writing. Other students, however, regard Joel as one of the latest. On this question scholars are about equally divided.
[2] Jonah was the only prophet sent to preach to a heathen people.

Proverbs, Book of.

Name.—The Hebrew title of the book is 'Mishle,' the singular of which is 'mashal,' usually translated "proverb." The word really signifies "likeness," and then a 'similitude' or 'parable.' It is frequently employed for short maxims or sententious sayings, which often consist in comparisons, or for longer or shorter didactic poems.

Authorship and Date.—These are a matter of uncertainty. The book seems to have been gradually formed between the time of Solomon and the Exile, 587 B.C.

Contents.—The book falls into eight parts: (1) Chs. 1-10. Ch. 1: 1-7 contains the title, "The proverbs of Solomon the son of David," etc., and is of the nature of a preface, indicating the aim and object of the book. The remaining portion of the section forms a connected poem in praise of wisdom. (2) Chs. 10-22: 16 bear the title, "The proverbs of Solomon," and form the first collection of Solomonic sayings. This section consists of ethical maxims, but loosely connected with one another. (3) Chs. 22: 17-24: 22 form a better connected whole than the preceding section, and consist of precepts and admonitions relating to justice and prudence. (4) Ch. 24: 23-34 forms an appendix to (3) and is entitled, "These things also belong to the wise." (5) Chs. 25-29 form the second collection of Solomonic sayings, and have the superscription, "These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out." The "men of Hezekiah" were probably a band of scribes or a literary college, established by that monarch, to whose care were entrusted the sacred writings of the nation and the task of editing them. (6) Ch. 30 is the first of three appendices which form the conclusion of the book. The proverbs in this chapter are attributed to "Agur the son of Jakeh." (7) Ch. 31: 1-9 forms the second appendix, and bears the title, "The words of King Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him." We know nothing about these two writers. (8) Contains the third appendix, ch. 31: 10-31, a didactic poem, the verses of which are arranged alphabetically,—whose theme is the praise of a virtuous woman.

Psalms, Book of.
Name and Formation.—The Hebrew title of this treasury of "prayer, praise, and adoration" is 'Sêpher Tehillim,' the "Book of Praises." Our name is the Anglicized form of the Greek title, 'psalmoi' (Lu. 24: 44; 20: 42). The early Christian fathers called it the Psalter. It is the first book of the third division of the Old Testament, the Hagiographa.
The "Psalms of David" is simply a popular form of reference because of David's prominence in the collection. The poet-king was probably the founder of the Psalter, but the collection was formed gradually and perhaps collected and arranged in Ezra's time.
Divisions, Peculiarities, and Authors.—In the Hebrew and in the R.V. the Psalter is divided into five books. This division was probably due to the similar division of the Pentateuch, and dates back to a period before the LXX. translation.
Book I. contains Ps. 1-41. Thirty-seven of the psalms in this books are ascribed in the titles to David.
Book II. comprises Ps. 42-72. In this book Ps. 42-49 are ascribed to the sons of Korah, Ps. 50 to Asaph, and Ps. 51-65 and 68-70 to David, Ps. 66, 67, and 71 are without titles, and Ps. 72 is headed "A Psalm of Solomon."
Book III. consists of Ps. 73-89. Ps. 73-83 inclusive are ascribed to Asaph; Ps. 84, 85, and 87 to the sons of Korah. Ps. 86 is entitled "A Prayer of David." Ps. 88 is assigned both to the sons of Korah and to Heman the Ezrahite; and Ps. 89 to Ethan the Ezrahite.
Book IV. contains Ps. 90-106. Ps. 90 is ascribed in the title to "Moses the man of God," and Ps. 101 and 103 to David. All the others are anonymous.
Book V. comprises Ps. 107 to end. Fifteen of these are, according to the Hebrew titles, Davidic. One (Ps. 127) is Solomonic. The fifteen psalms 120-134 are entitled "Songs of Degrees." These psalms were probably intended to be sung by the pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem.
The Titles.—Only thirty-four psalms are without titles. The superscriptions of the others indicate:
1. The liturgical character of the psalm, e.g. "For the precentor," or "chief musician,"

or the musical or religious features of the psalm, "a maschil," "a shiggaion," "a michtam," "a prayer," "a song of praise."
2. The instrument to be used in playing the accompaniment to the psalm.
3. The measure or melody to which it was to be sung.
4. The event which prompted the composition of the psalm, or the occasion on which it was to be used (e.g., the "Song of Degrees"; see above). In some cases the psalm is provided with two titles (e. g., Ps. 88).
5. The author; the following being named, in the superscriptions in the Hebrew Bible, as authors of the Psalms: Moses (one), Solomon (two), Asaph (twelve), Heman the Ezrahite (one), Ethan the Ezrahite (one), the sons of Korah (ten), and David (seventy-three, thirty-seven of which are found in the first book). The value of these titles is variously estimated.

Characteristics.—The subject-matter of the Psalter is varied. It contains prayers, songs of praise, lamentations, reflections on God's providence and his moral government of the world, expressions of faith, resignation, joy in God's presence; psalms referring to the personal circumstances of the psalmist; national, historical, and royal psalms (many of Messianic import); others of a didactic character, referring to matters of religion or morality. The psalms were used both in the public services of the Irsaelites and also in their private devotions, and afford a striking picture of the religious life and thought of the pious portion of Israel.

Psalms, classified, according to their subjects.
I. Psalms of Supplication:

publicans. Under Roman domination the 'Publicani' at Rome bought the revenues of the country at a fixed price and employed local subordinates to gather the taxes at the cost of the people. These latter formed the publicans of the New Testament. Their duties were to levy taxes of all sorts, and all classes were subject to their extortions. By a decree of Cæsar the taxes of Judea were levied by publicans in Judea and paid directly to the national government, the officials being appointed by the provincial officers. This made the publicans yet more unpopular, because they were the direct officials of a heathen power.

Purim [lots], the annual festival instituted to commemorate the preservation of the Jews in Persia from the massacre with which they were threatened through the machinations of Haman, Esth. 9. They gave the name Purim, or "Lots," to the commemorative festival because Haman had thrown lots to ascertain what day would be auspicious for him to carry into effect the bloody decree which the king had issued at his instance, Esth. 9: 24. The festival lasted two days, and was regularly observed on the 14th and 15th of Adar. At this feast the entire book of Esther is read with rejoicings of all present. After the service, they give themselves up to social merrymaking.

Revelation, Book of.
Authorship.—The general opinion has been that it was written by the apostle John; and such was the testimony of early authorities, as Justin Martyr, about 140 A.D. But the style is very different from the other writings of John the apostle; and this fact has led many to the view that its author was another John, as the name was common among the Jews. Still, the weight of authority is in favor of the apostle as its writer.
Date.—As to date, there are two opinions, about equally balanced, one that the vision took place in the reign of Nero, 68 A.D., the other that it was under Domitian, about 95 A.D. The writing may have taken place later than the vision itself, perhaps at Ephesus.
Characteristics.—Although several books of the N. T. were probably written after the Revelation, yet its position at the end of the series is appropriate. It is the one prophetic book in the N. T. which it closes. It gathers up preceding prophecies respecting the coming of the Messiah and the kingdom of heaven upon earth, and translates them into anticipations of the new advent, the new heavens, and the new earth. Its main theme is, "I come quickly;" and its object is to awaken in the believer the response, "Amen: come, Lord Jesus."
Interpretations.—There are three schools of interpreters, the Præterist, the Continuous, and the Futurist. The Præterists consider that the prophecies refer to events which are now past, and especially the overthrow of Jerusalem and of heathen Rome. The Continuous, or Historical, interpreters regard the book as a series of prophecies which have always been, and continue to be, in course of fulfilment. Some of its predictions have already been verified, others are in process of being so, while others again are as yet wholly unfulfilled. The results reached by this method differ enormously in details, e. g., as to whether the millennium is past or future, and what is the meaning of the number of the beast. The Futurists place the fulfilment of the whole series of predictions immediately before or after the second coming of Christ.
Summary.—Like the fourth Gospel, the Revelation has a prologue and an epilogue, between which (1: 19; 22: 5) the Revelation proper lies. This consists of seven visions, in which the symbolical numbers, three, four, seven, and twelve, are frequent. There are occasional interludes between the parts: (1) The vision of the throne of God and of the Lamb (chs. 4, 5); (2) the vision of the seven seals (6: 1-8: 1); (3) the vision of the seven trumpets (8: 2-11: 19); (4) the vision of the woman and her enemies (12: 1-13: 18); (5) the vision of the Lamb and the angels of judgment (ch. 14); (6) the vision of the seven vials of wrath (15:1-16:21); (7) the vision of final triumph (17:1-22:5). The book ends, as it began, with the certainty of Christ's coming, and of his perfect victory over his enemies, Satan, and sin, and death.

Romans, Epistle to the.
Author.—Nothing in the history of literature is more certain than that the four great epistles—to the Corinthians, the Galatians, and the Romans—are by the apostle St. Paul; and they contain all the essentials of the faith. They form the second and chief group of the Pauline Epistles, having been written four or five years after the two to the Thessalonians, and four or five years before the epistles of the captivity.
The epistle is written in Greek, not only because St. Paul could write most easily in that language, but also because it was most familiar to his readers.
Date.—Of the four great epistles, that to the Romans was written last, and apparently not long after the Epistle to the Galatians, which is the rough sketch out of which the elaborate treatise grew. All four were written within about fourteen months, in A.D. 57 and 58. Romans was written in the spring of 58, from Corinth, during a stay of three months in Greece.
The Church at Rome.—The Roman church for many generations was a Greek-speaking communion. Its origin is unknown, but there is no need to assume that an apostle founded it. Christians would migrate from various parts of the world to Rome, and would there make converts. The letter is addressed sometimes to Gentiles (1:6, 13; 11:13), sometimes to Jews (2; 3:19; 7:1), sometimes to both (chs. 9-11). Evidently there are plenty of both in the Roman church, and there is no sharp antagonism between them.
Occasion.—The letter to the Romans is a theological treatise rather than a letter, and the exact motive which induced the apostle to write it is not certain. The epistle is written calmly and deliberately, and betrays no trace of anxiety or pressure, or of any serious crisis in the church or city of Rome. St. Paul could not fail to see that the condition of Christianity in the metropolis of the empire must be momentous for the whole church. The departure of Phœbe, a deaconess of Cenchrea, port of Corinth, gave him an opportunity of sending a letter to the Christians in this important centre, and "the most profound work in existence" was the result. In it he tells the church in this city of conquerors to proclaim the gospel as the power of God, which by faith is to conquer the world, and to establish a spiritual empire greater than the material empire of Rome.

Contents.—In this treatise he expounds Christianity as a divine scheme for producing righteousness in man, and thus realizing the kingdom of the Messiah. The epistle has two main divisions, doctrinal and practical, with introduction and conclusion. Introductory (1:1-17); doctrinal—righteousness by faith (1:18-11:36); practical—Christian duties (12:1-15:13); valedictory (15:14-16:27.) The principal passages which touch on the divinity of Christ are 1:3, 4; 8:3; and perhaps 9:5; but in the last passage some would apply the doxology to God and not to Christ.

Historical Character.—The writer's object was to narrate an episode from the history of King David's ancestors, and to keep in remembrance the descent of that monarch. The events narrated occurred about a century before David. The genealogical table (although incomplete), and the fact that no writer would invent a Moabitish ancestress for the house of David, prove its historical character.
Author and Place.—The book was probably composed after the days of David.
Contents.—(1) The sojourn of Elimelech and Naomi, with their sons, in Moab, and the death of the father and sons (1: 1-5). (2) The return of Naomi and her daughter-in-law, Ruth, to Bethlehem (1: 6-22). (3) Ruth gleans in the fields of her kinsman, Boaz, and finds favor (2: 1-23); (4) Boaz recognizes her kinship and its rights (3: 1-18), and (5) protects her by marriage, from which marriage David is descended (4: 1-22).

Sabbath. The Sabbath is the only season of worship to which the decalogue makes any reference, and it stands first among the "feasts" in the catalogue contained in Lev. 23. Like the other festivals, it is called a "holy convocation." Its maintenance as a strict day of rest was insisted on even in the "earing time" and "harvest" (Ex. 34: 21). In the later days of the exile, the prophets gave special prominence in their teaching to the sanctity of the Sabbath (Ezek. 22: 26; cf. Jer. 17: 19-27; Ezek. 44: 24; Isa. 56: 2; 58: 13), enforcing the precepts that found legislative expression in stringent regulations (Ex. 31: 14; 35: 2, 3; Num. 15: 32-35), and in the reforming zeal of Nehemiah (13: 15-19).
What the precise form of Sabbath worship was, both before and after the exile, we cannot determine. Probably in earlier times it mainly consisted in sacrificial acts; probably also it was employed as a day for consulting the prophets in cases of difficulty, or the priests for responses with ephod or with Urim and Thummim (cf. II. Ki. 4: 23). During the Greek and Roman periods, when synagogue worship became established among all the Jewish settlements throughout Asia Minor, Egypt, and Europe, the reading of the Jewish Scriptures became the regular characteristic feature of Sabbath ritual.

Sadducees. The essential principle of the Sadducees was to observe the simple letter of the law, whatever the consequences might be. Primarily, they did not absolutely deny the doctrine of the resurrection as promulgated by the Pharisees, but only that the resurrection could be proved from the law. Yet between this and the direct denial of the doctrine there was but a step. They believed that earthly recompense and happiness, with long life and numerous descendants, constituted the only immortality.

While the Pharisees represented the better class among the Jews with regard to learning, the Sadducees were representatives of the priestly families of the aristocracy; hence the latter had more control than the Pharisees in the services of the temple, although they were less in numbers.

The principles of the Sadducees were as secular as those of the Pharisees were religious. They held many of the important offices, as high priests, priests, and judges. They allowed themselves a great deal of latitude with regard to the pleasure of the table and the luxuries of the court. By the people generally they were regarded as possessing hereditary nobility and as entitled to class privileges. As a rule, they were proud and arrogant. Necessarily they were sharply opposed to Jesus, whom they hated as a fanatic. They rapidly disappeared from history after the first century.

salutations. Oriental courtesies at meeting and parting are wont to be ceremonious. Spoken salutations among the Hebrew people were such as "The Lord bless thee" (Ru. 2: 4); "We bless you in the name of the Lord" (Ps. 129: 8). From the general use of the word 'bless' in greetings, that term came to signify 'salute,' and is sometimes translated "salute" (I. Sa. 13: 10).

Samaritans.—Between Judea and Galilee was Samaria, the home of the Samaritans, descendants of the mixed race that was formed by the imported colonists and the Israelites who remained in the land when the bulk of the ten tribes was carried into captivity. Upon the return from the captivity, the bitterness between the Jews and Samaritans grew into open hatred, so that the latter erected on Mount Gerizim, which they claimed to be the only place not covered by the flood, a temple of their own to Jehovah. They accepted Moses as the chief lawgiver, and the Pentateuch as their law, but rejected the traditions and rules of the Pharisees. They observed the rite of circumcision, the requirements of the Sabbath, and the yearly Jewish festivals, but denied the Jewish priesthood, and refused to accept Jerusalem as the one place where God's temple should stand. They believed in the coming of a Messiah, and expected that he would eventually convert all nations to Samaritanism. Samaria was not regarded by the Jews as belonging to the Holy Land, but, simply as "a Gentile tongue,"—a strip of foreign country. The very term 'Samaritan' was one of reproach.
Samaria in N.T. times was not a separate province in the land, but was a part of Judea. It possessed no definite boundary lines, but was simply a group of cities and towns occupied by this people. About 200 of them still remain, dwelling in Shechem (Nablous), and worshipping on Mount Gerizim.

Samuel, Book of.

Name.—In Hebrew MSS. the two books of Samuel are regarded as one. In the LXX. and Vulgate they are entitled the first and second books of Kings. The present division into two books was adopted from those two versions after the introduction of printing. The books are so called because Samuel is the most important character in the opening portion.

Author.—In the Talmud, Samuel is stated to have written the books that bear his name, also Ruth and Judges. No doubt much material was gathered by him. The composition belongs to an early date, probably shortly after the separation of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (cf. I. Sa. 27: 6). In its present form, however, the work appears to have undergone considerable modification.

Contents.—Whatever the date, the books are based on the records of the prophets contemporary with these kings. The books relate the histories of Samuel, Saul, and David, and may be divided into three parts: (1) I. Sa. 1-12, the history of Samuel until he retires from his position as judge, Eli's history being narrated so far as connected with that of Samuel. (2) I. Sa. 13-II. Sa. 1, the history of Saul from his accession until his death. (3) II. Sa. 2-24, the reign of David.

Sanhedrin, The. This was the great council of the Jews, who designated it as the "Great Court of Justice" and the "Great Sanhedrin." This national council remained in existence and authority until the Jews ceased to be a nation, in A.D. 70. It consisted of seventy persons, who are designated in the N. T. as "chief priests," "elders," and "scribes." While required to be of mature age, it was not necessary that its members should be the eldest of the people. The priestly portion of the body were Sadducees and the most distinguished, but the Pharisees were more numerous and possessed greater influence. The high priest, by virtue of his office, was the president. The Sanhedrin originally possessed supreme religious and secular jurisdiction. In the days of our Lord it determined all questions that were not reserved for the Roman authority. The confirmation and execution of death sentences were taken from the national council and reserved for the Roman procurator. The power of the Sanhedrin was recognized beyond the limits of Palestine—Jewish communities in distant countries submitting to its direction and decisions.

scribes. Originally they were men who were appointed secretaries to the king. Their work was to transcribe old records, and write new ones. Gradually they became students of the law, and easily from that the interpreters of the law; and by natural gradation, while aiming to promote reverence for the law and make it the groundwork of the life of the people, they came to be regarded as authority upon all questions concerning it.

The necessity for a class such as the scribes is readily apparent when it is recalled that the law was written in a language that ceased to be spoken about 500 B.C. The Jews believed that Moses received on Mount Sinai, in addition to the series of laws which he wrote down, a second series known as the oral law, which he gave first to Aaron, then to the sons of Aaron, and lastly to all the Israelites. This oral law was handed down from father to son, and from age to age, in course of time, with traditions and corruptions, making a mass of ceremonial requirements. After the captivity, piety was made to consist in the strictest conformity to the multitudinous precepts of this double and complicated code.

In the time of Christ the scribes were also jurists, judges, and public instructors. They met together for the discussion of legal questions, but their decisions were required to be confirmed by the Sanhedrin. Their places of meeting for teaching the law were called "houses of assembly," or "houses of the rabbis." One of these was in the temple, where Jesus, when a boy of but twelve years of age, awakened so much interest by his knowledge and his questionings and answers. A scribe was addressed as Rabbi, or Master. The scribes usually performed their duties without pecuniary gain, giving themselves to some useful calling in order to personal support

Although their character as a class in the time of Christ was possibly one of unconscious hyprocrisy, yet it is fair to say that some among them were wise in matters of Christ's kingdom. They represented that which was best, as well as that which was worst, in Judaism.

seal. The importance attached to seals in the East is so great that without one no document is regarded as authentic. Among the methods of sealing used in Egypt at a very early period were engraved stones, pierced through their length and hung by a string or chain from the arm or neck, or set in rings for the finger. The most ancient form used for this purpose was the scarabæus, formed of precious or common stone, or even of blue pottery or porcelain, on the flat side of which the inscription or device was engraved. In many cases the seal consisted of a lump of clay, impressed with the seal and attached to the document, whether of papyrus or other material, by strings. In other cases wax was used. In sealing a sepulchre or box, the fastening was covered with clay or wax, and the impression from a seal of one in authority was stamped upon it, so that it could not be broken open without discovery.

Sinai (sī'nāi) [thorny]. Nearly in the centre of the peninsula which stretches between the horns of the Red Sea lies a wedge of granite, grünstein and porphyry rocks rising to between 8000 and 9000 feet above the sea.

1. Names—These mountains are called Horeb and sometimes Sinai. Some think that Horeb is the name of the whole range, and Sinai the name of a particular mountain. But Stanley suggests that the distinction is one of usage, and that both names are applied to the same place.

2. The mountain from which the law was given.—Modern investigators have generally come to the conclusion that Ras Sŭfsâfeh, the modern Horeb of the monks, viz., the northwest and lower face of the Jebel Mûsa, crowned with a range of magnificent cliffs, the highest point called Ras Sŭfsâfeh, as overlooking the plain 'er Râhah'—is the scene of the giving of the law, and that peak the mountain into which Moses ascended. The entire mountain is a mass two miles long and one mile broad. The southern peak is 7363 feet high; the northern peak, Ras Sŭfsâfeh, is 6830 feet high. It is in full view of the plain er Râhah, where the children of Israel were encamped. This plain is a smooth camping-ground, surrounded by mountains. It is about two miles long by half a mile broad, embracing 400 acres of available standing-ground made into a natural amphitheatre by a low semi-circular mound about 300 yards from the foot of the mountain. By actual measurement it contains over 2,000,000 square yards, and with its branches over 4,000,000 square

Song of Songs, The.
Name and Author.—The Song of Songs (A.V., The Song of Solomon) is in the Hebrew canon the first of the five Megilloth or rolls and is annually read by the Jews in their synagogues at the Feast of the Passover. The traditional view is that the author is Solomon, appeal being made to evidences internal and external.
Structure.—It was formerly supposed that the book consisted of a number of independent songs, which were only united together by a common subject. It is now generally admitted that the song is a single poem, the production of one author.
Interpretations. — Various interpretations have been given: (1) According to the old opinion there are only two principal characters, King Solomon and a Shulamite maiden, of whom the king was enamored. The conclusion expresses in glowing terms the superiority of pure and genuine affection over that which may be obtained by wealth and position. (2) It has been thought to be an ode composed at the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter. (3) From ch. 6:4 it has been suggested that it was designed to bring together again the tribes of Israel. (4) The poem may be interpreted literally. Whether the allegorical interpretation, dating back to the Targum, and frequently adopted by many ancient and modern scholars, is admissible is another question. And though some, in interpreting the poem allegorically, have been led into extravagance, it is a fact that Christ's love to his redeemed church is in the New Testament compared to conjugal love.

The Bible has been translated into 226 different languages.
The Old Testament was divided into chapters, as they now stand, by Cardinal Hugo, in the middle of the thirteenth century. These chapters were divided into verses, as we now have them, by Rabbi Nathan, and adopted by Robert Stephens, a French printer, in his edition of the Vulgate, in 1555, and transferred to the Authorized Version in 1611.
The New Testament was divided into chapters by Hugo de St. Cher about 1240, and into verses by Robert Stephens, and first published by him in 1551, and thence were transferred to the English version published in Geneva in 1560.

Synagogue, The. Although the temple in Jerusalem was the place to which every devout Jew looked, and toward which he prayed, the necessities of the Jewish people during the captivity led to the institution of the synagogue, or school of religion. In the time of Christ the synagogue system was at the height of its prosperity. Sacrifices were, of course, legal only in the temple, but prayers were offered and the Scriptures were read and expounded in the synagogue. In Jerusalem there were nearly five hundred such Jewish schools or synagogues, while every city and town had one or more, according to population. Certain men were appointed to maintain order, and these were called elders. As the ancient Hebrew was an unknown language to many, an interpreter translated the Scriptures into Aramaic, the dialect of the common people. Prayer was offered standing, while the teaching was conducted in a sitting posture. Chief seats were arranged for the rulers, the rabbis, and distinguished men who might be present. Attendance on the services was imperative, and while there the people were to behave in a suitable manner. Although there were some occasions when eating and drinking, and even sleeping, were allowed in the synagogue, as a rule the house was regarded as sacred to God and his worship. While the synagogue did not wholly take the place of the temple, it was second to it only in point of importance, and greater in its religious influence upon the Jewish race.

Tabernacle, The.
Design.—The tabernacle was designed to represent Jehovah, the God of Israel, dwelling in the midst of his people in the holy of holies, communing with them through the priests, and receiving their worship and offerings at the altar.

The Outer Court and Its Furniture.—The outer court was surrounded by fine twined linen screens, 5 cubits in height, hung by silver hooks upon pillars of brass resting in sockets of brass. Of these pillars there were twenty on the southern side, twenty on the northern, and ten on the western. The eastern side had also ten pillars. The space thus enclosed was 100 cubits by 50, or in round numbers 150 feet by 75.
In the outer court, which was accessible to all the Israelites, stood the altar of burnt-offering, square in shape, 5 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 in height (Ex. 27:1-8). It was made of acacia wood, covered with brass. The laver of brass with its pedestal of brass, placed between the tabernacle and the altar, is most minutely described in Ex. 30:17-21. This outer court was a perfect square (50 cubits by 50), occupying exactly half of the space of the whole enclosure.
The Tabernacle Proper, Its Construction and Coverings.—Inside the enclosure, 50 cubits from the entrance into the outer court towards the western end, was the tabernacle proper 'mishcan,' covered by a large tent, 'ohel,' spread "over it," thus protecting it from sun and rain (Ex. 26:7; 36:14). The tabernacle proper was 30 cubits long, 10 broad, and 10 high. It was externally a parallelogram, with an entrance on the eastern side; its innermost shrine, the holy of holies, was towards the west. The two longer sides, the northern and southern, were each composed of twenty boards of shittim or acacia wood, overlaid with gold, each board being 10 cubits in height and 1½ in breadth. The western side was formed of eight such boards (Ex. 26:25), two of which formed the posts at the angles (Ex. 26:22-24). On the eastern side was the entrance, closed by the curtains of "blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, the work of the embroiderer."
The ceiling of the tabernacle was formed of ten curtains; each curtain was 28 cubits long by 4 broad. The covering composed of these curtains, when joined together (40 cubits long by 28 wide), sufficed to cover the tabernacle above, with its northern and southern sides, leaving only a small space uncovered near the ground on each side.
Such was the 'mishcan,' or tabernacle proper. Over the whole of this splendid structure an outer tent was pitched. In order to give the fullest protection to the interior tabernacle, the outer tent had three special coverings of goats' hair, rams' skins, and "badgers' skins," perhaps the skin of some sea-animal.
The Holy Place and Its Furniture.—The sanctuary, or the holy place, was 20 cubits long by 10 wide, and 10 cubits in height, the curtain on the western end dividing it from the holy of holies. This outer cham ber of the tabernacle proper was accessible only to the priests. In it stood the altar of incense, the seven-branched candlestick, and the table of showbread.

1. The Altar of Incense was also square, 1 cubit long by 1 cubit broad, and 2 cubits in height (Ex. 30: 1-10). It was formed of acacia wood, overlaid with pure gold, with horns of gold, and a crown or rim of gold round its sides, with golden rings on two sides, and staves overlaid with gold, by which it could be carried. Incense only was burned thereon.
2. The Candlestick was of pure gold, of beaten work. It had seven arms, the centre one being the shaft, formed on each side of three cups of almond blossoms, their knops and flowers (Ex. 25: 31-40). The lamps, which were placed on the tops of the seven branches, were separate from the candlestick itself, and were supplied with oil from oil vessels which are not specially described. The height of the candlestick is not mentioned. Its lamps were lighted and trimmed daily by the priests, and kept constantly burning (Ex. 27: 20, 21).
3. The Table of Showbread was also of acacia wood, overlaid with pure gold—2 cubits in length, 1 in breadth, and 1½ in height. It also had a crown or rim of gold round it, and staves overlaid with gold to carry it with, which were placed in four golden rings (Ex. 25: 23-30). On this table were every week placed twelve loaves of bread to represent the twelves tribes, arranged in two rows of six loaves each. The loaves which were removed were eaten, by the priests in the holy place.

The Holy of Holies and the Ark of the Covenant.—The holy of holies, or most holy place, was in the Mosaic tabernacle completely dark. It was 10 cubits long by 10 in width, and 10 in height, being a perfect cube. Three of its sides were formed of the acacia boards covered with gold noticed before, its fourth side being formed by the curtain, or veil, suspended from four pillars which veil screened off the most holy from the holy place. Into the holy of holies no one was permitted to enter except the high priest on the annual day of atonement, described in Lev. 16.

The sole furniture of the holy of holies consisted of the ark of the covenant. The latter was an oblong chest made of acacia wood, overlaid within and without with gold. Its dimensions were 2½ cubits long by 1½ in breadth and depth. Its lid, termed "the mercy-seat," was also overlaid with gold, with a golden rim, or crown, round it; out of the same piece of beaten gold were formed two cherubim, one cherub at the one end and one cherub at the other end of the lid. These cherubim spread out their wings, on high, covering the mercy-seat with them, their faces being towards one another, but their countenances directed as if looking down upon the mercy-seat (Ex. 37: 1-9). The Lord is often represented as throned between the cherubim.

On the sides of the ark were placed four golden rings, through which staves of acacia wood, overlaid with gold, were placed, so that the ark could be carried thereby. In the journeys of the children of Israel the ark was borne by the sons of Kohath

Inside the ark were the two tables of stone, termed the "testimony," on which were the ten commandments, written with the finger of God. It is expressly stated that when the ark was brought into the temple of Solomon it contained nothing else (I. Ki. 8:9). The pot of manna (Ex. 16:33) and Aaron's rod that budded (Nu. 17:10) were laid up "before the testimony," but were not placed inside the ark.

Tabernacle, Feast of.
This was held in commemoration of the forty years' outdoor life in the wilderness, after the Israelites came out of Egypt, when they lived in tents and "booths." It began on the 15th day of the seventh month, or Tishri, and continued for one week. Fruit, palm branches, boughs of large trees, and willows from the brook were gathered by the pilgrim crowd, and booths erected. The first day (the 15th) was a day of holy convocation or public worship, on which there was to be a cessation from all servile labor (Lev. 23:25). The following six days, 16th to 21st, were devoted to the free enjoyment of this festal season.
In later times a part of each day's ceremony was the drawing of water from the pool of Siloam, so intimately connected with our Lord's words in John 7:37, 38. Another feature was the lighting of four great candelabra, which were set up in the middle of the court, and illuminated all Jerusalem. Compare John 8:12.

Tal'mud (i.e. 'doctrine,' from the Hebrew word "to learn") is a large collection of writings, containing a full account of the civil and religious laws of the Jews. It was a fundamental principle of the Pharisees, common to them with all orthodox modern Jews, that by the side of the written law, regarded as a summary of the principles and general laws of the Hebrew people, there was an oral law, to complete and to explain the written law. This oral law, with the numerous commentaries upon it, forms the Talmud. It consists of two parts, the Mishna and Gemara. (1) The 'Mishna,' or "second law," which contains a compendium of the whole ritual law, was reduced to writing in its present form by Rabbi Jehuda the Holy, a Jew of great wealth and influence, who flourished in the second century of the Christian era. Viewed as a whole, the precepts in the Mishna treated men like children, formalizing and defining the minutest particulars of ritual observances. The Mishna is very concisely written, and requires notes. (2) This circumstance led to the commentaries called 'Gemara' (i.e. supplement, completion), which form the second part of the Talmud, and which are very commonly meant when the word "Talmud" is used by itself.

tares. There can be little doubt that the 'zizania' of the parable, Mat. 13:25, denotes the weed called "darnel" ('Lolium temulentum'). The darnel before it comes into ear is very similar in appearance to wheat; hence the command that the 'zizania' should be left to the harvest, lest while men plucked up the tares "they should root up also the wheat with them."

Temple, The.

The Three Temples.—All these stood in succession upon the same site, and were arranged upon the same general plan. (1) Solomon's Temple. Built about B.C. 970, and standing until B.C. 587, when it was destroyed by the Babylonians (II. Ki. 25: 8, 9). (2) Zerubbabel's Temple. After lying desolate more than fifty years the second temple was begun about B.C. 534, under Zerubbabel, the ruler of the exiles returned from Babylon (Ezra 3: 8). This temple was far inferior in splendor to the first, but soon became the object of pilgrimage to Jews from all lands and the centre of Jewish national and religious life. (3) Herod's Temple. The second temple having become dilapidated, Herod the Great undertook its restoration on a magnificent scale. The work was begun about B.C. 20 and was not completed until A.D. 64. This temple was destroyed by the Romans under Titus, A.D. 70. Its site is now occupied partially by the Dome of the Rock miscalled the Mosque of Omar, in Jerusalem.

The Situation.—Between the valley of the Kidron and the valley of the Tyropœon were two hills—on the north Mount Moriah, and a little to the south a spur of lower elevation known as Ophel. On Mount Moriah stood the temple, on Ophel the buildings of Solomon's palace. Later the temple area was enlarged to include both these hills.

The House of the Lord.—This was a building not large, but magnificent and costly; made of stone and cedar, and decorated lavishly with gold and precious stones. It consisted of four parts: (1) The Porch, a lofty tower facing the east. Two pillars, either in the tower at the entrance or standing apart before it, are named (I. Ki. 7: 21). The interior dimensions of the porch were about 30 feet from north to south, and 15 feet east and west (I. Ki. 6: 3). (2) The Holy Place was west of the porch, and was a chamber 60 feet long by 30 wide, and perhaps 30 feet high. In it stood, on the north, the table for "the showbread"—that is, the twelve loaves shown before the Lord; on the south the golden candlestick, or lampstand; and at the western end the golden altar of incense. (3) The Holy of Holies, or "the oracle" (I. Ki. 6: 19, 20), was a cube each dimension being 30 feet. It had no windows, but received a dim light through the veil which separated it from the adjoining room. This place was entered by the high priest only, and on but one day in the year, the day of atonement. The only article of furniture in the room was the Ark of the Covenant, containing the two tables of the law. The Ark doubtless was destroyed with the first temple, and in the second and third temples its place was indicated by a marble block, upon which the blood was sprinkled. (4) The Chambers were rooms for the priests situated around the house, with entrance from without. They were in three stories, and were set apart for the residence of the priests while employed in the services of the temple. Each priest served two weeks in the year; not, however, two weeks in succession, but six months apart, and lived at his home for the rest of the time. In similar chambers around the old tabernacle Eli and Samuel slept (I. Sa. 3: 2, 3).

The Court of the Priests was an open, unroofed quadrangle surrounding the House of the Lord, but mainly in front, toward the east. It was about 200 feet wide, north and south, by 275 feet long east and west, a few feet lower in elevation than the floor of the temple proper. Here stood the great 'Altar of Burnt Offering,' upon which the daily sacrifice was offered, its site now shown under the Dome of the Rock; and near the door to the house 'the Laver,' for washing the sacrifices. Solomon built also a great "Sea," or reservoir of water, standing on the backs of twelve oxen, all of "brass," probably copper (I. Ki. 7: 23-26). This was broken up by the Babylonians, B.C. 587 (II. Ki. 25: 13), and was not replaced in the later temples.

Around the Court of the Priests was another and larger corridor, the 'Court of Israel,' or "the men's court." In the later temples this was 320 by 240 feet in dimensions, 26 feet wide on the north and south, 24 feet wide on the east and west. The size of this court in Solomon's temple is not given, but was probably the same as in later times. This was the standing place of the worshippers (exclusively men) as they witnessed the service.

These were the only courts around the first temple, as the space to the south of the last-named court was occupied by Solomon's palaces, from which a magnificent flight of steps ascended to the temple area (I. Ki. 10: 5). East of the Court of Israel, and a little lower, stood the 'Court of the Women,' 200 feet square, having a lattice gallery on the western side, from which the women could look on the services of the altar. This court was also called "the Treasury" (John 8: 20) from the gift boxes fastened upon the wall (Mar. 12: 41, 42). In each corner of this court was a room said to be 60 feet square, with an open roof.

Around all these buildings and courts, with Herod's temple, but not with Solomon's, was the 'Court of the Gentiles,' an irregular quadrangle of about 1,000 feet on each side (north 990, east 1,000, south 960, west 1,060). The wall on the east was surmounted by a double row of columns, and called Solomon's Porch (John 10: 23; Ac. 3: 11). The "Beautiful Gate" was from the Court of the Gentiles to the eastern side of the Court of the Women (Ac. 3: 1), through which the people passed on their way to the public worship. The narrow corridor extending entirely around the Court of the Women and the Court of Israel was called "Chel"—that is, the sacred inclosure—and no one except an Israelite was permitted to enter it. The Court of the Gentiles was not regarded by the Jews as sacred, since foreigners were allowed within it, and in its area had grown up a market for the sale of animals for sacrifice and tables for the exchanging of foreign money. Twice this court was purged of these desecrations by Jesus (John 2: 13-17; Mat. 21: 12, 13).

teraphim. This word occurs only in the plural, and denotes images connected with magical rites. The derivation of the name is obscure. In one case—I. Sa. 19: 13, 16—a single statue seems to be intended by the plural. The teraphim, translated "images" in the A.V., carried away from Laban by Rachel were regarded by Laban as gods. Teraphim again are included among Micah's images. Judg. 17: 3-5; 18: 17, 18, 20.

Thessalonians, First Epistle to.

Date.—These two epistles to the Thessalonians form the earliest group among the letters of St. Paul; and the first of them is probably the earliest Christian document that has come down to us. The apostle wrote the First Epistle from Corinth, in the names of himself, Silas, and Timothy, late in 52 or early in 53.

The Church.—Thessalonica was a prosperous city on the Thermaic Gulf, the capital of Macedonia Secunda, and seat of a Roman proconsul. Many Jews had settled there for the sake of its commercial advantages. St. Paul founded the church there on his second missionary journey, in company with Silas, about A.D. 52. Jewish persecution became so intense that he was obliged to leave the city; but his implacable enemies followed him to Berea, and made that place also unsafe for him. His friends sent him away to Athens, where he waited for Silas and Timothy, who had remained behind at Berea (Ac. 17); and they ultimately joined him at Corinth (18: 5).

Contents.—First Thessalonians shows us a young church which had embraced the faith with enthusiasm, but is not yet free from heathen vices, and is moreover much excited about questions respecting the end of the world, which tended to promote idleness and gossip. After the salutations and thanksgiving (ch. 1), we have two main divisions: declarations of affection and satisfaction (2: 1-3: 13); advice and comfort, because of the triumph in the resurrection (4: 1-5: 22). In the conclusion (5: 23-28), the direction that the epistle is to be read to all the brethren, and not retained by a select few, is quite in place with the first letter written by the apostle to a Christian church.

Thessalonians, Second Epistle to.

Date.—The Second Epistle was written before A.D. 58, but how long after the First Epistle cannot be determined; probably a number of months. Silvanus and Timothy are still with St. Paul (1: 1), and that perhaps points to his being still at Corinth.

Contents.—The main divisions of the epistle are marked by the chapters. Salutation and thanksgiving (ch. 1); warning about the date of the advent (ch. 2); exhortation to prayer and work (3: 1-15), with benediction (v. 16) and autograph conclusion (vs. 17, 18).

threshing. The wheat, etc., was reaped by the sickle or pulled up by the roots. It was bound in sheaves. The sheaves or heaps were carted, Am. 2: 13, to the floor—a circular spot of hard ground, probably, as now, from 50 to 80 or 100 feet in diameter. Gen. 1: 10, 11; II. Sa. 24: 16, 18. On these the oxen, etc., forbidden to be muzzled, Deu. 25: 4, trampled out the grain. At a later time the Jews used a threshing sledge called 'morag,' Isa. 41: 15; II. Sa. 24: 22; I. Chr. 21: 23, probably resembling the 'noreg,' still employed in Egypt—a frame with three rollers ridged with iron, which, aided by the driver's weight, crushed out, often injuring, the grain, as well as cut or tore the straw, which thus became fit for fodder. Lighter grains were beaten out with a stick. Isa. 28: 27.

throne. The Hebrew word so translated applies to any elevated seat occupied by a person in authority, whether a high priest, I. Sa. 1: 9, a judge, Ps. 122: 5, or a military chief, Jer. 1: 15. The use of a chair in a country where the usual postures were squatting and reclining was at all times regarded as a symbol of dignity, II. Ki. 4: 10; Prov. 9: 14. The king sat on his throne on state occasions. At such times he appeared in his royal robes. The throne was the symbol of supreme power and dignity, Gen. 41: 40.

Timothy, First Epistle to.
Author.—Timothy would be barely thirty-five years of age when Paul, who was nearly twice as old, wrote the First Epistle to him.
Occasion and Date.—After Paul's release, Timothy had been left by him in Ephesus to check erroneous doctrine, while Paul went on to Macedonia (1: 3-7) to visit his loved Philippians (Phil. 2: 24). Not knowing when he may return (3: 14, 15), the apostle writes to instruct Timothy about a variety of matters. This was probably about 65.
Summary.—We have the eminently Pauline salutation (1: 1, 2) and thanksgiving (1: 12-17) at the outset. Then the subjects of public worship (ch. 2), officers of the church (ch. 3), false teachers and asceticism (ch. 4), Timothy, First Epistle to—Continued widows and elders (ch. 5), slaves, false teachers and covetousness (6: 1-19) are discussed; and the letter closes with a charge and a benediction (6: 20, 21).

Timothy, Second Epistle to.

Date.—The Second Epistle to Timothy was written from the prison in Rome, near the close of the second imprisonment, A.D. 67 or 68. It was written in the conviction that the end was near at hand.

Occasion.—The immediate motive of the letter is the desire to see Timothy, a desire so urgent that it is expressed four times (1: 4; 4: 9, 11, 21). But the writer takes the opportunity of expressing a great deal more than this personal wish.

Contents.—The apostle sends his last instructions to his disciple and delegate, and to all future ministers in the church. Death, which will free him from bonds, toil, and anxiety, and bring him home to Christ, will take him from the churches which sorely need him, and from the friends who love him and lean on him; dark days are coming, and even love is waxing cold; hence the urgent appeals all through the letter to be firm and courageous (1: 6-14; 2: 1-13; 3: 14; 4: 1-5). The conduct of Timothy occupies about one-third of the epistle, the second main subject being the present and future condition of the church (2: 14-3: 17). Towards the close the apostle speaks of himself (4: 6-21). Like the First Epistle, the letter has the thoroughly Pauline salutation (1: 1, 2), thanksgiving (1: 3-5), and benediction (4: 22); which last contains the last recorded words of the apostle of the Gentiles.

tin (Heb., 'bedil'). The chief use of tin in early times was most probably as a constituent of the alloy, with copper, known as bronze. tithe or tenth, the proportion of property devoted to religious uses from very early times. Instances of the use of tithes are found prior to the appointment of the Levitical tithes under the law. In biblical history the two prominent instances are—(1) Abram presenting the tenth of all his property, or rather of the spoils of his victory, to Melchizedek. Gen. 14: 20; Heb. 7: 2, 6. (2) Jacob, after his vision at Luz, devoting a tenth of all his property to God in case he should return home in safety. Gen. 28: 22. The summary of the Israelite laws concerning the tithe seems to be the following: (1) That one tenth of the whole produce of the soil was to be assigned for the maintenance of the Levites. (2) That out of this the Levites were to dedicate a tenth to God for the use of the high priest. (3) That a tithe, in all probability a 'second' tithe, was to be applied to festival purposes. (4) That in every third year, either this festival tithe or a 'third' tenth was to be eaten in company with the poor and the Levites.

Titus, Epistle to.

Author.—The epistle was written by Paul to Titus, who was an occasional companion of the apostle. Paul writes of him to the Galatians as a person well known to them (2: 1), but we do not know when he was in that country. Apparently he was not one of the apostle's constant companions, but worked more or less independently. This epistle reveals him in Crete where St. Paul had left him some time before, perhaps in A.D. 65. When II. Timothy was written a year or two later (66 or 67), Titus had been with Paul in Rome during his second imprisonment there, but had left him to go into Dalmatia. He was one of St. Paul's most trusted disciples, and apparently was a stronger man than Timothy. The apostle seems to be less anxious about him.

Object and Contents.—The main object of the letter is to instruct Titus how to carry on the work which Paul had left so incomplete, especially in organizing a regular ministry by the appointment of elders, and in combating false teachers. Like both the letters to Timothy, it has little or no arrangement. Subjects are treated as they come to the writer's mind, in a natural but not a systematic order. The rather long and solemn salutation (1: 1-4) is followed by a discussion of the needs of the Cretan church (1: 5-3: 11); after which we have of the seventh month (Tishri) of the 'ecclesiastical' and of the first of the 'civil' year. It was therefore a new-year festival. It was a solemn rest day, or Sabbath, on which no work was done, being a new moon feast. This feast, unlike Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, did not require a visit to Jerusalem, but was held everywhere throughout the land.

Versions or Translations of the Bible.

I. Ancient Versions of the Old Testament.

It is generally agreed that the Septuagint, or LXX. as it is often written, was made at Alexandria, that it was begun in the time of Ptolemy, who reigned 284-247 B.C., and that the translation of the Law was made first.

Not only the Jews of Egypt, but those of Palestine as well, used it regularly in the time of our Lord. Greek was spoken everywhere, while Hebrew was not widely known. The quotations from the Old Testament which we find in the New Testament were taken from the Septuagint, not from the Hebrew.

The Targums.—At what time the Jews lost the use of their language is a disputed point; but when the mass of the people could no longer understand their native tongue, the Law was publicly read as described in Neh. 8. The reader read a passage, and the Meturgeman, or interpreter, gave the sense in the Aramaic. For this custom in New Testament times see Lu. 4: 16, et seq. There was great strictness enforced in regard to the exegesis of the Law by the Meturgeman, but greater liberty was allowed in the interpretation of the prophetical writings, Psalms, Proverbs, etc.

The writing down of these interpretations gave rise to the Targums. They are, therefore, free paraphrases of the Old Testament, and were never intended to be strict translations. They were compiled by different authors at different ages, long after the oral traditions had become fixed. The most important of the Targums are those of Onkelos on the Pentateuch, of Jonathan on the Pentateuch, and of Jonathan on the prophets. The text of the Targums is very corrupt, and their chief value to the biblical student is the material they afford for the study of the traditional exegesis of the Jews in the early centuries of our era.

II. Versions of the Old and New Testaments.

The Syriac, or Peshitto, as it is commonly called. This version had its origin in the needs of the Syrian Christians for the sacred Scriptures, which were from the first much used by the Christians, whether Jew or Gentile, in their native tongue. This version was therefore made by Christians, and it is perhaps the first made by them. It arose probably in the early part of the second century. The translation shows evidence of different hands and different periods.

The Old Latin and the Vulgate.—The Vulgate was preceded by the Old Latin version, orthe Itala,which originated in Africa in the second century, and was used by the early Latin fathers, as Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine. It has been preserved only in fragments, so far as is now known, and its full character and value are therefore uncertain. It is a rendering of the LXX., not of the Hebrew. But a version in a rude provincial dialect would not serve the purpose of the great Latin church of the fourth century, and to supply this need Jerome made his famous Latin translation—the 'Vulgate.' Jerome began the great task at the request of the Bishop of Rome. The New Testament was corrected first. In the Old Testament he first revised the Psalms after the Greek text of his time. A second revision of the Psalter was made, along with other books, and this edition, called the Gallican Psalter, was never displaced by his later and more accurate work, and is in the Vulgate to this day. Jerome found that, to make his version thorough, he must follow the original. This task was not finished till A.D. 405.

III. English Versions of the Bible.

The whole Bible was never translated into Anglo-Saxon. 'Cædmon' of Whitby (d. 676) made a metrical paraphase of Genesis I, which he called the "Origin of Things." He also paraphased the more prominent events of Old Testament history.

Bede, commonly called the Venerable (b. 672—d. 735), translated the Lord's Prayer and the Gospel of John into Anglo-Saxon. An interlinear translation into Anglo-Saxon of the four Gospels in Latin was made by 'Aldred,' about A.D. 900.

Alfred the Great (b. 849—d. 901) prefixed an Anglo-Saxon translation of the Ten Commandments to his book of laws, to which he added selections from Exodus 21, 22, 23. He also undertook an Anglo-Saxon rendering of the Psalms, but died before the work was finished.

An Anglo-Saxon translation, in excellent language and style, of the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Esther, Job (with parts of Judith and Maccabees), was made by 'Ælfric,' who became archbishop of Canterbury about 966. His rendering of Genesis shows the existence of previous translations, of which he made use.

The earliest rendering of any book of Scripture into English prose was a translation of the Psalms by William of Shoreham, about 1327. The next prose rendering was also a version of the Psalter, by Richard Rolle of Hampole, near Dancoster. He died 1349. All these versions were made from the Vulgate.

In 1382-83, a version of the Holy Bible, containing the apocryphal books, was made from the Vulgate by John Wycliffe (b. 1324—d. 1384), aided by his friend Nicholas de Hereford, who translated a large part of the Old Testament. This version was made from the Latin Vulgate, and not from the original Hebrew and Greek. Wycliffe's Bible gave a strong impulse to sacred study; it stimulated desire for the Scriptures in the language of the people, and left an impress traceable in every later version.

In 1484, a century after Wycliffe's death, William Tyndale was born. With his labors in translating the Scriptures the direct history of the English Bible begins. The publication of Tyndale's New Testament was begun in Cologne in 1525, and finished at Worms in 1526. In 1534 he published, at Antwerp, a revised edition, with a translation of extracts from the Old Testament. In 1530 his translation of the Pentateuch appeared, and in 1531 the book of Jonah. A Bible published a year after his martyrdom contains a translation by him of all the books from Genesis to II. Chronicles inclusive. For five centuries his version has shaped the diction, phraseology, and style of every other. Its spirit pervades all its successors. The simple, sublime, and pure language of the Authorized Version is due to it. Its influence may be said to have informed and consecrated the English language itself.

Miles Coverdale's Version, in 1535, was the first publication of the whole Bible in English. It is not, strictly speaking, an original version, but a compilation from five—the Vulgate, Tyndale's, Luther's, the German-Swiss version of Zurich, and Pagninus' Latin. The Prayer-Book version of the Psalms is in essence, and for the most part in words, Coverdale's version. Many of the happiest renderings of the Psalms in the A.V. are due to Coverdale.

Matthew's Bible was published in 1537. The name Matthew is a pseudonym for John Rogers, the real author, who was the first martyr in Queen Mary's reign. Rogers was born about 1500 and burnt alive at Smithfield in 1555. Matthew's Bible is not an independent translation. The Pentateuch and New Testament are reprinted from Tyndale; the Old Testament books from Ezra to Malachi (with the apocryphal) are copied from Coverdale; only the books from Joshua to II. Chronicles are a new translation. Having been published by the authority of Henry VIII., this was the first "authorized version."

In 1539 a revised edition of Matthew's Bible was published by Richard Taverner (b. 1505—d. 1575) a layman.

The Great Bible—so called because of its size, being fifteen inches long and nine inches wide—appeared in 1539, the same year as Taverner's. It is essentially a revision o

Matthew's Bible, by Coverdale. The publication was carried out under Cromwell's auspices, although Coverdale was editor. In 1540 a revised edition of the Great Bible was issued, with an introduction by Cranmer. This version is known as Cranmer's Bible, but without sufficient reason, for Coverdale was editor as before.

The Geneva Bible was published in 1560. It was the work of eminent scholars exiled from England by the persecutions which raged during the reign of Mary. Among these were John Knox, Miles Coverdale, William Whittingham, and other men largely equipped with sacred learning. They settled in Geneva, and there, with the aid of Calvin and Beza, after two years' labor, completed the New Testament in 1557. Three years later the whole Bible was published. It was dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, went through at least eighty editions, and for sixty years was the most popular of all the versions. It anticipated many of the happiest renderings in the A.V. It was the first English Bible divided into verses, and the first to print in Italics all the words not in the original.

The Bishops' Bible was published in 1568. Its promoter was Archbishop Parker, who, with eight bishops, several deans and professors, highly reputed for learning, set himself to produce "one other special Bible for the churches." The basis of this version is obviously the 'Great Bible.' The Bishops' Bible adopted the division into verses which had been made in the Geneva Bible. It continued to be the standard version until the appearance of the 'Authorized' in 1611.

The Rhemish Version of the New Testament is an English translation published in 1582, at Rheims in France. It was executed by Roman Catholic scholars. By the same translators an English rendering of the Old Testament was published at Douai in 1610. This version and a revised edition of the Rhemish Testament constitute the 'Douai Bible,' used by Roman Catholics. As a version, the Douai Bible is simply the common and not the genuine Latin text of Jerome, in an English dress.

The Authorized Version was published in 1611. It was the work of forty-seven scholars appointed by James I. These revisers were divided into six companies, to each of which a specified portion of Scripture was assigned. The renderings of the several companies were finally reviewed by the entire body. Seven years were spent on the work. Directly or indirectly, every prior version influenced their translation. The spirit of Tyndale especially pervades it. Always, however, and in everything, the revisers exercised independent judgment. The dialect of the A.V. is nearer men's minds than their own speech. Its influence has made the English language what it is, and has created our literature.

The Revised Version declares itself "the version set forth A.D. 1611 compared with the most ancient authorities and revised A.D. 1881." It originated in the Convocation of Canterbury, May 6, 1870, by the appointment of a committee, with whom should be associated other learned men representing the churches using the A.V. A similar committee was formed in America to co-operate with the British company of revisers. Thus was started the first international and inter-denominational effort to bring the A.V. into accord with the present standard of biblical knowledge.

The first meeting of the New Testament Company was held June 22, 1870; the last meeting was held on November 11, 1880. The Revised Version of the New Testament was published on the 17th of the following May. The Old Testament Company held its first meeting June 30, 1870; its last meeting was held on the 20th of June, 1884. The Revised Version of the Old Testament was published May 19, 1885.

The Revised greatly excels in the precision with which it reproduces the true force of the tenses and of compound verbs. It seizes the distinctive senses of prepositions, exhibits them with a fidelity never before attained in English. Throughout, difficult passages have been much simplified. By substituting modern terms for obsolete and archaic ones, great gain in clearness has been effected.

The American Revised Version is a modification of the R.V., containing the changes that were recommended by the American company of Revisers, but not accepted by the English company, and such other changes as appeared to the American Company to be needed, after an experience with the R.V. of nearly twenty years. It was published in 1901.

washing the hands and feet. As knives and forks were not used in the East, in Scripture times, in eating, it was necessary that the hand, which was thrust into the common dish, should be scrupulously clean; and again, as sandals were ineffectual against the dust and heat of the climate, washing the feet on entering a house was an act both of respect to the company and of refreshment to the traveller. The former of these usages was transformed by the Pharisees of the N.T. age into a matter of ritual observance, Mar. 7:3, and special rules were laid down as to the time and manner of its performance. Washing the feet did not rise to the dignity of a ritual observance except in connection with the services of the sanctuary. Ex. 30:19, 21. It held a high place, however, among the rites of hospitality.

watch. The Jews divided night into three parts, called watches, the first from sunset till 10 p.m.; the second or middle watch from 10 till 2 o'clock a.m.; the third or morning from 2 o'clock till sunrise (Ex. 14:24; I. Sa. 11:11). The Romans divided night into four watches of three hours each; the first or even from 6 till 9 o'clock p.m.; the second or midnight from 9 till 12 o'clock; the third or cock-crowing from 12 till 3 a.m.; the fourth or morning from 3 till 6 o'clock (Mar. 6:48; 13:35).

Zealots. A Jewish party which refused to pay tribute to the Romans. It arose in the reign of Herod the Great; made frequent rebellions; and was opposed to all recognition of foreign rule. This party obtained control in Jerusalem about 68 A.D., and was as fierce against all other parties as against the Romans. The word "zealot" in Hebrew is represented by Cananæan, Mat. 10:4; Mar. 3:18.

referred to, Mat. 23:35; Lu. 11:51.
—the prophet, Zec. 1:1; 7:1, 8; Ezra 5:1; 6:14.

Zechariah, Book of.
Author and Purpose.—Zechariah was the son of Berechiah, and grandson of Iddo, one of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4, 16). He prophesied in the second and fourth years of Darius Hystaspes (B.C. 520 and 518) (cf. 1:1, 7; 7:1), and was associated with the prophet Haggai (cf. Ezra 5:1; 6:14). The book falls into two parts, chs. 1-8 and chs. 9-14. Part first is undoubtedly the work of Zechariah, but the authorship and date of part second are much disputed.
Contents.—I. (1) Ch. 1:1-6 contains an earnest exhortation to repentance. (2) Chs. 1:7-6:8 comprise eight apocalyptic visions. (3) Ch. 6:9-15 forms an appendix to what precedes, descriptive of the crowning of the high priest Joshua, symbolical of the coming of the Messiah (the Branch) as High Priest and King. (4) Chs. 7 and 8, the prophet points out that Jehovah requires no fasts, but obedience to his law, concluding with a promise that the Lord will again turn to his people, and change their fasting into joy and gladness.
II. In ch. 9 the prophet describes the future of the Jewish church, and foretells the coming of the King who shall "speak peace unto the heathen" (9:10), and have world-wide dominion. In ch. 10 he describes the war of the children of Zion against the Greeks, and in chs. 11 and 12 sketches the outlines of the same period down to the advent of the Messiah and his rejection by Israel. Ch. 12 contains a striking description of the mourning in Jerusalem. In ch. 13 is described "the reaction against the false prophets, in the post-exilic period, which subsequently led to the rejection of the true Prophet of Israel." Ch. 14 is of an apocalyptic character, and was doubtless not intended to be interpreted literally. It is a vision "of the last things as seen in the light of the Old Testament."

Zephaniah (zĕf-a-nī'ah) [Jehovah hides], priest, Jer. 29:25; 37:3.
—prophet, Zep. 1; 2; 3.

Zephaniah, Book of.
Author and Date.—Zephaniah was a great-grandson of Hezekiah, and prophesied during the reign of Josiah. It is probable that Zephaniah wrote before the great reformation in the eighteenth year of King Josiah (B.C. 621).
Contents.—The prophecy falls into three parts: (1) In ch. 1 the prophet graphically describes the great day of wrath coming upon the nations of the earth, and especially upon Judah and Jerusalem. (2) In chs. 2:1-3:8 the prophet exhorts the people to repent, and thus escape the doom that threatens the Philistines, Moab, Ammon, Ethiopia, and even Nineveh itself. (3) In ch. 3:8-20 the prophet promises the Messianic blessings to the remnant of
